Mr. CONGER. If the Chair please, I am compelled to speak like lightning, or the Chair gets ahead of me every time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will not be struck. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman object to any further proceedings except the regular order?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir; I will try to watch and take the opportunity to object if I desire to do so.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that there be a call of the States for the introduction of bills, &c.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition?

Mr. CONGER. There is objection.

WRONGS TO CHILDREN.

Mr. FRYE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2025) to prevent and punish wrongs to children in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN F. B. STEWART.

Mr. FRYE asked unanimous consent to introduce for reference a bill for the relief of Captain F. B. Stewart, late assistant quartermaster United States Volunteers.

Mr. COFFROTH. I object to the introduction of any bill, unless there can be opportunity for the introduction of all bills.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at seventeen minutes past twelve, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts. The pending question is on seconding the demand for the previous question on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. For the purpose of accommodating the will of the House, as there seems to be a disposition to debate the bill and to offer amendments, I am willing to withdraw the demand for the previous question, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to be placed on the public Calendar. On this motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to amend his motion so as to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] by referring to Rule 43, will find that, even if the motion to refer to a standing committee were made, priority must be given to the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If this motion should be voted down, then the motion which the gentleman from Maine indicates would be in order.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, there were 85 in the affirmative and 1 in the negative—no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER, and Mr. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes none.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. On seconding the demand for the previous question the yeas and nays cannot be taken.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move, then, that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following-named members failed to answer:

Aldrich, William	Cowgill,	Lay,	Robertson,
Atkins,	Crowley,	Loring,	Russell, Daniel L.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WHITTHORNE said: I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. ATKINS, is absent by reason of indisposition.

The roll-call being concluded,

The SPEAKER said: A quorum is present. Two hundred and fourteen members have answered to their names.

Mr. ACKLEN. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ACKLEN, there were—ayes 45, noes 8.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will order tellers. It does not require a quorum to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. CONGER. Then I shall demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 191, nays 18, not voting 76; as follows:

So the House dispensed with all further proceedings under the call.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. ATKINS, is detained from the House by reason of sickness, and to remark in that connection that I trust the House will excuse him knowing his industry and fidelity to the public business.

Mr. HILL. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If he were present, I should vote "ay."

Mr. HURD. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CLAFLIN.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, is paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. HOSTETLER. My colleague, Mr. COBB, is paired with Mr. GARFIELD.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, is paired with Mr. MILES, of Connecticut.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. GARFIELD is paired with Mr. COBB, and Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, with Mr. WARNER.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. COWGILL. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. MORSE. I am paired with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. KEIFER is paired with Mr. ROTHWELL.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the demand for the previous question on the motion to commit, and the tellers will resume their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, no 1.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The morning hour has expired I believe, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. CONGER. There must be a great many in the House refusing to go on with public business, as only fifty-one voted on the last count. Evidently there are some two hundred members present, and yet that is all we can get willing to do business. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman neglected to count himself as one of the tellers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move that the remainder of the morning hour be dispensed with that I may be enabled to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. According to the last vote the House is without a quorum.

Mr. CONVERSE. I think we can find a quorum to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour will expire in a few moments.

After a pause,

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, are there any dispatches from the Ohio convention?

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is recognized.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is being proceeded with.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is nothing on the Speaker's table.

Mr. CONGER. I should like we had an opportunity to go there and see.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized. The Chair will next recognize the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer for reference to the Committee on Rules the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this is the regular order. The Chair will hear the resolution read. No advantage will be taken of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that that resolution cannot be received under the rules, since it is the right of any member after the morning hour has expired to move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to offer the resolution relating to change of the rules, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule 51 by adding thereto the following——

Mr. CONGER, (interrupting the reading.) I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This is in order, being an amendment to the rules.

Mr. CONGER. Under what rule?

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the proposition be read, and I will show the gentleman under what rule it is in order.

Mr. COX. I ask to have the rule read before the point of order is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause it to be read. The Chair thought the gentleman from Illinois was going to read it.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that after the expiration of the morning hour the next regular business is the right of any member to move that the House go to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that that is not in order under this rule.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman makes the point of order, the Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

145. No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor—November 13, 1794; nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present—March 13, 1822; nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present; nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules, except during the last six days of the session, and on Monday of every week at the expiration of one hour after the Journal is read—April 26, 1828, and June 22, 1874—unless the call of States and Territories for bills on leave and resolutions has been earlier concluded, when the Speaker may entertain a motion to suspend the rules.—June 8, 1864.

The SPEAKER. On page 269 of the Digest there is a note appended to a part of this rule. The Chair will read the paragraph:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor.—Rule 145.

Then there is this note:

There is no authority given, as in the case of notices of bills, to file this notice with the Clerk. Consequently it can only be given in open House, and only at such time as any other independent motion can be made.

That was a decision given in the Twenty-fifth Congress at the second session. The Chair directs to be read a paragraph from the Journal of that Congress:

The Clerk read as follows:

The rule which required this resolution to lie on the table one day for consideration was dispensed with; and it was then read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. Thomas submitted the following amendment to the rules; which was read and laid on the table one day, under the rule, viz:

Add to the 20th rule the words following: And on the first Friday of each month the calendar of private bills shall be called over, and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of; private bills from the Senate having a preference over private bills of the House.

The SPEAKER. This decision was rendered by James K. Polk, then the Speaker and afterward President. The resolution of the gentleman from Illinois is therefore in order; but under the rule it must lie over for one day.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I have the right to have the resolution read.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its being introduced at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the resolution as a matter of right on the part of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CONGER. I have asked under what rule the gentleman has the right to offer the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has read the rule, and the practice under it.

Mr. CONGER. But there never has been a rule which prevents the motion being made immediately at the termination of the morning hour to go to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not prevent that now.

Mr. CONGER. But the Chair gives precedence to another motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was recognized before the gentleman from Michigan made the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table, and the gentleman had a right to give his notice at a time when any other independent motion could be made.

Mr. CONGER. I objected to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had not the right to object, and the Chair had not the right to recognize him to object.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order and directs the resolution to be read.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McMAHON. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. COX. I desire to have the resolution read before voting on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That is part of the objection, and the Chair considers it as embraced in the appeal.

Mr. CONGER. The very object of the appeal is to prevent the reading.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I submit that the appeal ought to be submitted in writing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not require that unless the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] does.

The question was put on Mr. McMAHON'S motion to lay the appeal on the table; and on a division there were 78 in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported 82 in the affirmative and none in the negative.

Mr. CONGER. No quorum has voted.

Mr. CLYMER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BREWER. I move that the House adjourn; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 11, nays 186, not voting 88; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. ARMFIELD. I am paired with Mr. FIELD, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. KITCHIN, is paired with Mr. MASON, of New York.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, is paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. BOUCK. I am paired with Mr. McKINLEY, of Ohio.

Mr. HOSTETLER. My colleague, Mr. COBB, is paired with Mr. GARFIELD.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. My colleague, Mr. LORING, is paired with Mr. HOOKER, of Mississippi. My colleague, Mr. CLAFLIN, is paired with Mr. HURD, of Ohio.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. VALENTINE is paired with Mr. McKENZIE, of Kentucky.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; and the name of Mr. POEHLER having been called and responded to,

Mr. HUNTON said: I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUNTON. The hour of two o'clock has arrived, at which time, by order of the House, the Committee for the District of Columbia is entitled to report for consideration matters from that committee.

The SPEAKER. An examination of the record does not show that when the hour of two o'clock to-day was fixed for the consideration of District business the order was made to run to the interruption of all other business, as is the practice under the rule giving the third Monday of each month to the District Committee. The Chair, however, is willing to recognize the Committee on the District of Columbia as now entitled to submit reports for consideration if objection is not made by any member. The pending question will therefore go over.

Mr. CONGER. Go over till when?

The SPEAKER. It will go over as unfinished business.

Mr. CONGER. And come up again to-day after the District business has been disposed of, or on some other day?

The SPEAKER. Come up to-day after the District business has been disposed of, if the House should not adjourn; and should the House adjourn, it will come up to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. MILLS. The roll-call has not been completed.

The SPEAKER. It has not been; but the Chair has allowed the interruption because it has been decided that on the third Monday of each month, under the rule, the District Committee has the right to absolutely take possession of the floor at two o'clock to the exclusion of all other business. While the first order made fixing a different day from the one mentioned in the rule included in it the provision that the District Committee should on that day have all the rights which they had under the rule, yet the last time the order was made that right seems to have been omitted. The Chair, however, will not take advantage of that omission, but will rule as the Chair thinks was the intention of the House, that at two o'clock to-day the District is entitled absolutely to the possession of the floor.

Mr. CONGER. The only exception to the District business to-day after two o'clock was that it should not interfere with appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. That is all the exception which the RECORD shows. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] thinks that his committee should have to-day from two o'clock, and the Chair will so allow. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that if the District Committee shall conclude their business before the adjournment of the House to-day, the unfinished business will come up right away.

Mr. CONGER. And the roll-call will then proceed?

The SPEAKER. The roll-call will then be completed, or will be commenced over again. The Chair thinks it would be better to commence the roll-call again if the matter goes over from to-day.

Mr. CONGER. All that we desire on this side is to have a little warning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has given full notice so that no member shall be taken by surprise. The unfinished business coming over from the last day assigned to the Committee for the District of Columbia will now be taken up.

Mr. MILLS. Has the roll-call been completed?

The SPEAKER. It has not been.

Mr. MILLS. Can any business interrupt that roll-call?

The SPEAKER. On the third Monday of the month, which by the rule is assigned to business from the District of Columbia Committee after two o'clock, the Chair thinks it has been the practice that at two o'clock the business of that Committee shall be proceeded with even to the exclusion of all other business. The rule will be read.

Mr. MILLS. I do not care to have the rule read, if the Chair has decided the point.

The SPEAKER. Then the business coming over from the last District day will be proceeded with.

CATTLE DISEASES.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent to have an order made——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] yield?

Mr. HUNTON. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HATCH. House bill No. 1378 was made a special order for the 20th of May, after the morning hour, not to interfere with the coinage bill. I ask unanimous consent now that that bill be set down as a special order for to-morrow, and to be continued from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. What is that bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a bill which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and set for consideration for the 20th of May. It was not considered on that day, however, because the coinage bill intervened. The proposition now is to have it made a special order for to-morrow, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. Not to interfere with any appropriation bill.

Mr. MILLS. Does the bill propose to interfere with the transportation of Texas cattle into or across the Missouri?

Mr. HATCH. It does not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks that this bill be set down for to-morrow after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. DUNNELL. What is the title of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is House bill No. 1378, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. CONGER. Not to interfere with any proposition connected with appropriations.

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

The SPEAKER. Not to interfere with appropriation bills or propositions relating thereto.

Mr. CONGER. I want to include more than appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the language used by the Chair is as broad as that of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I did not perhaps hear the last words of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will repeat the proposition: To make the bill referred to a special order for to-morrow after the morning hour and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with appropriation bills or with any proposition relating thereto.

Mr. McKENZIE. I object.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. I object to the latter clause of the proposition.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] will proceed.

Mr. McKENZIE. I withdraw the objection.

No further objection being made, it was ordered that House bill No. 1378, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals, be made a special order for Thursday, May 29, after the morning hour and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not to interfere with appropriation bills or with propositions relating thereto.

BRIDGE OVER POTOMAC RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) The bill coming over as unfinished business from the last District day is the bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUNTON. At the request of many of the friends of this bill I move that it be passed over, not to be called up again during this session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be passed over.

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WATER SERVICE.

Mr. HENKLE, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with an amendment and with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties and limitations provided in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia: Provided, That water-main taxes and water rents shall be uniform in said District: And provided further, That the rate of interest specified in section 202 of said Revised Statutes shall be increased to 10 per cent. per annum from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to advance to said commissioners the sum of $25,000, to be reimbursed by payment into the Treasury of the United States until said sum is paid in full of all collections of water-main taxes now due said District, and the money so advanced shall be expended to improve the water supply on Capitol Hill and other higher portions of Washington.

The amendment reported from the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of section 2 strike out the words "and other higher portions of Washington."

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask that the section of the Revised Statutes to which this bill refers be read.

Mr. HENKLE. I ask the Clerk to read a communication from the commissioners for the District of Columbia, which explains more clearly than I can do the reasons for the passage of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., April 23, 1879.

SIR: The commissioners of the District of Columbia respectfully represent to Congress their inability to conduct the water department upon the present basis of water rents and water-main tax.

The water rents remain the same as established at the time the Potomac water was introduced, and depend not upon the extent of water facilities enjoyed, but upon the height and width of the houses to which the water is supplied.

The present water-main tax, which was authorized by an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District, approved June 23, 1873, is a tax of one and one-fourth cents per square foot of lots abutting the streets in which water mains are laid, payable in four annual installments bearing 6 per cent. interest. No provision was made for the payment of the cost of mains at the time they were laid, and the only means at the control of the District government to pay it, pending the collection of said tax, have been the receipts from water rents, which were intended to meet the ordinary repairs and other current expenses of the water department and the interest and sinking fund on certain water bonds. The collections from water-main taxes have been insufficient to refund the amounts so advanced from water rents, there being now an outstanding balance of $113,536.01 uncollected water-main taxes, which represents advances made, as aforesaid, from receipts on account of water rents.

The interest upon water bonds amounts to $29,600 for the year 1879, and sinking fund to $15,000, making in all $44,600 for both purposes. The amount derived from rents is about $92,000 per annum. Taking from this the amount for interest and sinking fund ($44,600) leaves $47,400, plus the small amount of collections from water taps and fees, to pay for the repairs and other current expenses of the water department and the immediate cost of water mains. The amount is insufficient to meet all these purposes. Most of the employés of the water department have been placed on furlough from want of funds to pay their salaries, and there is not money to refund the general fund the amount paid from it on account of the sinking fund of the current year.

The people in certain of the higher portions of the city are suffering from a scarcity of water. Owing to the exceptionally large consumption of water per capita in the District, no effectual remedy can be devised by which any great measure of relief can be given in such cases unless by the extension and completion of the aqueduct. The second section of the following bill contemplates an expenditure of $25,000 to remedy some defects in the present distribution of water by which certain benefits will accrue to the higher levels.

These facts were presented to the last Congress and a bill passed the Senate providing for an increase of water rents and for an advance of $25,000 to enable the commissioners to improve the water supply above referred to.

The commissioners now pray Congress to enact the following measure:

A bill to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties and limitations provided in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia: Provided, That water-main taxes and water rents shall be uniform in said District: And provided further, That the rate of interest specified in section 202 of said Revised Statutes shall be increased to 10 per cent. per annum from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to advance to said commissioners the sum of $25,000, to be reimbursed by payment into the Treasury of the United States, until said sum is paid in full, of all collections of water-main taxes now due said District; and the money so advanced shall be expended to improve the water supply on Capitol Hill and other higher portions of Washington.

By order of the board:

S. L. PHELPS, President.

Hon. S. J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HENKLE. I call the previous question on the bill and pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment reported by the committee was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENKLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FUNDED INDEBTEDNESS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SAMFORD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to prepare, execute, and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States bonds of the District of Columbia, bearing interest not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, and payable twenty years after date, to the amount of not more than $1,200,000, the proceeds to be used only for the redemption of funded indebtedness of said District or of the late municipal corporations of Washington and Georgetown which became due January 1 and March 1, 1879, or those now existing and payable at pleasure, for the redemption of which the sinking fund of said District may not provide. Said 5 per cent. bonds shall be in such form and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall approve, and shall be numbered consecutively and registered in the office of the auditor of said District, and also in the office of the Register of the Treasury of the United States, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, and shall bear the seal of the District of Columbia.

Said bonds shall be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury to the highest bidder upon public tender, but for not less than their par value, after being advertised for one week in two daily newspapers in the city of Washington and two in the city of New York. The bids shall be opened by the Secretary of the Treasury and the awards approved by him. The money realized from the sale of said bonds shall be paid out by the Secretary of the Treasury only for the purposes named in this act.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of all acts conflicting herewith and the acts or parts of acts authorizing said commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue bonds to redeem certain bonds of said District falling due January 1 and March 1, 1879, no bonds having been issued thereunder, are hereby repealed.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the rate of interest now being paid on bonds of the District of Columbia?

Mr. SAMFORD. On some of the bonds 6 per cent and on others 5 per cent. The object of this bill, to which I suppose there will be no objection, is simply to allow the District to fund its indebtedness at a lower rate of interest. It does not provide for any increase of that indebtedness.

Mr. BLOUNT. The bill in the first part provides that the bonds shall bear interest not exceeding 5 per cent., and then further on, in the regulations as to the sale of bonds, it speaks of them as "5 per cent. bonds."

Mr. SAMFORD. The interest is not to exceed 5 per cent.

Mr. BLOUNT. But, as I understood the reading of the bill, the regulations prescribed contemplate that 5 per cent. bonds alone are to be issued.

Mr. SAMFORD. The provision of the bill is that the commissioners, together with the Secretary of the Treasury, shall issue bonds bearing a rate of interest not to exceed 5 per cent. Some little discretion is left to them. If they can negotiate bonds at a lower rate of interest they are authorized to do so. There are now $940,900 of 6 per cent. bonds, due at pleasure; $53,000 of bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest, which are also due at pleasure; $279,000 of 6 per cent. bonds, due the first of this year; and $2,500 of 6 per cent. bonds due March 1, 1879. These various amounts make more than the amount authorized by the bill, $1,200,000; but the excess, as the commissioners think, can be provided for by a sinking fund. The whole object of the bill, as I have just stated, is simply to provide for funding the debt of the District at a lower rate of interest.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman having this bill in charge whether its passage will increase the public debt of the city of Washington?

Mr. SAMFORD. No, sir, I do not understand that it will.

Mr. HUNTON. On the contrary it will decrease the debt of the District. The gentleman will recollect that at the last session of Congress a law was passed authorizing the District commissioners to fund $281,000 of bonds then due, at a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent. The commissioners upon examining the state of the market found that the amount was too small to enable them to dispose of the bonds of the District with advantage. The object of this bill is to increase the amount and to fund the debt which is payable at the pleasure of the District.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will put one further question to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] as he has volunteered a response to my former question: Why does not this bill fix the length of time that these bonds shall run? Why leave that with the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. HUNTON. Upon consultation between the commissioners and the Secretary of the Treasury the term of twenty years was agreed upon.

Mr. DUNNELL. Why not state that in the bill?

Mr. SAMFORD. It is stated in the bill that the bonds are to run twenty years.

Mr. DUNNELL. I did not understand that the period these bonds are to run was set out in the bill.

Mr. SAMFORD. Yes, sir; it is.

Mr. COX. I ask whether or not this bill by implication or otherwise fixes any responsibility upon the Federal Government for the payment of the principal or interest of this debt?

Mr. SAMFORD. I do not understand it does further than the general law now in force, which is that the General Government is responsible for half the expenses of this District.

Mr. COX. I utterly repudiate that construction of the general law, and want my friend to be guarded, since contemporaneous history sometimes interprets law, against fixing any responsibility on the part of the Federal Government for these District bonds.

Mr. SAMFORD. I will say in reply that I do not understand the Federal Government is responsible for a particle of this interest or principal. If such should be my construction of the present law I would be opposed to these new bonds. A session or two ago a law was passed authorizing the District commissioners to sell bonds to an amount of $280,000. When they attempted to sell these bonds they were informed by capitalists it was too small an amount, and they could not dispose of them at a low rate of interest. There was other indebtedness of the District which was about to fall due, and since has fallen due, amounting in the aggregate to more than is provided in this bill, and the surplus falling due will be provided for by a sinking fund. And it is to meet that $280,000, together with $940,000 and $53,000, all bearing a high rate of interest, that the District commissioners ask authority be given to them to issue bonds at a rate of interest not exceeding 5 per cent. Of course if they can sell them at a lower rate of interest it will be done. That I understand to be the full scope of the bill. It does not in any manner pledge the Federal Government to the payment of interest or principal.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope, then, the gentleman will say so by proviso.

Mr. COX. I was about to suggest that.

Mr. McMILLIN. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. SAMFORD. Let me say before that amendment is offered, Mr. Speaker, that the act providing for the government of the District of Columbia specifically sets out what are to be the liabilities of the Federal Government, and nowhere in that general law does it provide the Federal Government is to be responsible for the interest on its bonds, except what are known as the 3.65 bonds. This is a provision made by this bill which in no manner makes the Federal Government responsible. If, then, the Federal Government is not responsible under the general law and is not made so by this bill, I cannot imagine how by implication the Federal Government could be liable.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then the gentleman can have no objection to adding a proviso to the bill to that effect.

Mr. SAMFORD. Personally I have none, and I do not imagine that any member of the Committee for the District of Columbia would have objection to such proviso.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have an amendment which I desire to offer, and ask the Clerk to read it.

Mr. HEILMAN. I have examined this bill with a great deal of care. It is all right and it ought to be passed.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have an amendment which will obviate any objection on the ground of liability of the Federal Government.

Mr. SAMFORD. I will hear it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to make the Government of the United States liable for either the principal or interest of such bonds.

Mr. HEILMAN. I do not think there is any necessity for the amendment at all. The bill is all right as it is. The amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. SAMFORD. I think, Mr. Speaker, it is utterly useless, as the reading of the bill will show; but, as it can do no harm, and I am advised by the chairman of the committee he has no objection to it, I will allow it to come in.

Mr. COX. Let the amendment have added to it the words "neither one-half nor any part." That will be safe.

Mr. SAMFORD. That is in accordance with my idea.

Mr. HUNTON. I cannot conceive of the necessity for the amendment proposed to this bill. The language of the bill is that the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and are hereby, authorized to prepare, execute, and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States bonds of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SAMFORD. Bearing the seal of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON. Bearing interest not exceeding 5 per cent., and payable twenty years after date, to be used for the purpose of replacing bonds now outstanding of the District of Columbia. And it has the seal of the District, and there is nothing about the bill or the bonds that I know of that can possibly be construed into a liability of the United States Government for the principal or interest of the bonds.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman not concede that the amendment will make the bill no worse?

Mr. HUNTON. That was stated a while ago. I think it was unnecessary to ask me the question.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. It is conceded that the Federal Government is liable for one-half of the debt of the District and the expenses——

Mr. HUNTON. You are the first gentleman I have heard make that concession. The people of the District will be glad to hear it.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. May I ask the gentleman who is to pay the debt under the law providing a permanent government for the District?

Mr. HUNTON. The people of the District have to pay the debt which the District owes.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I have understood from a number of persons that it is claimed that the Federal Government was liable for the entire issue of the District bonds.

Mr. HUNTON. The gentleman is referring to the 3.65 bonds, which are not affected by this bill at all. This bill affects only certain bonds, the character of which was explained by my friend from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD.] There are $940,800 of bonds now due and payable at the pleasure of the District, bearing 6 per cent. interest; $53,000 of bonds at 5 per cent. interest; $20,000 at 8 per cent. interest; and so on. The sums stated constitute the amount of the funding provided for in this bill. That is the old indebtedness of the District not touched by the 3.65 bonds at all; and it is the 3.65 bonds which have produced the difficulty to which my friend from New York [Mr. LOUNSBERY] has alluded.

It strikes me there is an oversensitiveness on the part of some gentlemen in this House when anything comes up as to the indebtedness of the District of Columbia. I take it there is not a member of the District Committee who would bring in a bill to make the Federal Government by implication liable for a debt for which it is now liable; and I cannot conceive how there can be the slightest misunderstanding of the provisions of this bill. It provides for an exchange of the bonds of the District bearing 6, 8, and 5 per cent., and thus reduces the indebtedness of the District of Columbia. That is the sole object of the bill.

Mr. COX. It is required by this bill that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have something to do with these bonds. The United States is always brought in in connection with these matters. To be sure, the seal is the District of Columbia seal; but Mr. John Sherman must countersign in some way so as to give the bond the imprimatur of the Treasury.

Mr. HUNTON. Where do you find that?

Mr. SAMFORD. The bill says:

> Said 5 per cent. bonds shall be in such form and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall approve.

Mr. COX. I take it that means some sort of countersigning or approval. And I know this: that step by step this District has proceeded until they have now compelled the Federal Government to assume one-half at least of the liability for the interest on certain bonds. It was never intended in the first place that the Federal Government should indorse these bonds. The courts go out of their way, in my judgment, to find the liability of the United States for these bonds. Cunning men will place the bonds here provided for on the market as bearing the indorsement of the United States. This bill in its first section provides that—

> Said 5 per cent. bonds shall be in such form and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall approve.

Why not the commissioners of the District? Why this implication of liability on the part of the United States? What is the objection to guarding this bill as my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] proposes? It cannot make the bonds any worse in the market.

Mr. SAMFORD. I understand that amendment is accepted.

Mr. COX. I understood my friend from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to oppose it.

Mr. SAMFORD. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to say there was no necessity for the amendment but he had no objection to it.

Mr. COX. Then I have not spoken entirely in vain.

Mr. NEAL. This bill provides that these bonds shall be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now I suppose it is known to every member in this House that the Secretary of the Treasury is the treasurer of the District of Columbia. He has the disbursement of all the funds of the District. They all go into his hands and through him are paid out. It is therefore eminently proper that he should be the person who should have the disposition of these bonds; necessarily so it seems to me. It is true we might put this business into the hands of the commissioners if Congress in its wisdom thinks that that is the best plan to adopt; but in my opinion it would be an ill-advised policy on our part; for I do not believe it is possible for the District to negotiate these bonds upon as favorable terms as the Secretary of the Treasury can do it.

We have had an illustration within the last few days of the impolicy of tying the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the disposition of the bonds of the United States. We have seen here day after day droves of persons thronging the Treasury Department in order to get the ten-dollar certificates which were authorized to be sold by an act of the Forty-fifth Congress; and those same persons step immediately across the street and sell at 2 per cent. premium the certificates which they receive and which the Secretary of the Treasury was bound by the act of the Forty-fifth Congress to sell at par. By reason of that act there has been lost to the Treasury of the United States not less than a million and a half of dollars which might have been realized had the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury not been tied. Had the bill as it was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the Forty-fifth Congress been passed without any amendment the Secretary of the Treasury would have realized from the sale of those bonds a million and a half of dollars which have now gone into the pockets of the speculators in those ten-dollar certificates.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of the Treasury is the proper person to dispose of those bonds. But if, as the gentleman from New York seems to think, there is any possibility of construing this law so as to make the Government of the United States liable in any way that it is not now liable, then let the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee be adopted. It will have no injurious effect, I presume, and it may serve to quiet the consciences of members upon this floor who, like the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] are always apprehensive that the Government of the United States is in some way to be involved in every measure which is brought here in the interest of the District of Columbia.

Mr. COX. The gentleman refers to my conscience on the subject of the District of Columbia. I beg to say one word and then I will quit. I came here some twenty years ago, before this new régime in the District commenced. They did not hardly ask for the lighting of the city then except Pennsylvania avenue, or for a police force; but one by one, step by step, they have so far progressed that they claim that at least one-half of their expenses shall be paid by the United States Government. I am sensitive about it, and I am in favor of guarding all bills about the District of Columbia upon the principle ex abundanti cautela; and out of abundant caution I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I am glad that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has seen fit to show that sort of sensitiveness about the liability of the Federal Government and about its expenditures in the District which my friend from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] has seen fit to censure him for. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] has very properly stated that before the war the Federal Government paid but a very small part of the expenses of this District.

We are paying for a great many things now, paying hundreds of thousands of dollars, where then the Federal Government paid nothing at all. The expenditures of the Federal Government in this District were small in amount until the Forty-second Congress, and then these expenditures and the transactions connected with them brought this District and the parties connected with it into public scandal. In the Forty-third, which followed, some reform was had. In the Forty-fourth there was an effort to get back to something like the former economy in expenditures. In the Forty-fifth the legislation charged upon the people of this country a proportion of expenditures which surpassed any legislation in the whole history of the country. There was a time in the Forty-fourth Congress when the liability of the Government for the 3.65 bonds was quite questionable, and denied by the democratic majority of that House; and I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will not fail to repeat, wherever he can, that he and others are sensitive upon this subject, and that they are determined to protect the public treasury, and that there are gentlemen who have constituencies to protect and who are determined to utter their own views in legislation.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to say one word in reference to my own position and in reference to the position of this bill. When I read the law which was passed before this Congress and which was approved in June last, and with which several of the members of the present Committee for the District of Columbia had nothing to do, it seems to me to have been a very peculiar law. You find in the provisions of that bill that those liabilities which the Federal Government is required to divide with the District of Columbia are the ordinary expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the cost of maintaining all the public institutions of charity and the like and the cost of making all permanent improvements and the like. Whether that provision is wise or not is not the question.

Now, if I were called upon to vote upon that law I should not hesitate to vote in the negative. I find also in that same law that the United States is required to indorse and to pay in the first instance the interest on the 3.65 bonds, which amounts to several millions of dollars—the exact amount I do not remember. The Federal Government is required to pay the interest on those bonds, and that interest is to be deducted from the half which the Federal Government is required to pay in the way of expenses, that is, under the law as it now stands.

Now, finding the law thus, finding in addition thereto that several issues of bonds are outstanding bearing a rate of interest higher than 5 per cent. on bonds which were due, the committee was applied to by the commissioners for the District of Columbia to afford them some relief to meet the bonds due, and in doing so to enable them to have a lower rate of interest.

It was in response to that request of the commissioners of the District of Columbia that this bill was introduced, and it was required that the bonds should be registered in the Treasury and sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for the reason given by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] that the Secretary of the Treasury is the treasurer of the District of Columbia. There is no telling how permanent the present administration of these two cities and of this District may be, and therefore for the purpose of securing permanency these bonds are required to be registered in the Treasury, and for the additional reason of affording a check upon the commissioners if such were necessary.

That is the whole and the sole reason why the Secretary of the Treasury has anything whatever to do with the matter. Therefore, as I said, not intending by this bill to commit the Federal Government to the payment of one single cent of the principal or the interest, I do not hesitate, so far as I can do so, to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MCMILLIN.] If there should be any objection to the acceptance of that amendment on the part of any member of the committee, then I should ask that the House take a vote upon it.

Mr. FINLEY. Cannot the gentleman accept the amendment?

Mr. SAMFORD. Perhaps some other member of the committee might object to the acceptance of it. I do not accept it, because I do not have the authority to do so, although I am in favor of it. But I am sure, under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, the Federal Government will in no way become liable for the bonds to be issued. The sole object of the bill is to lower the rate of interest on existing bonds, and to that extent relieve the tax-payers of this city and District from some of their enormous burden of interest on the debt. If I thought the Federal Government would be made liable for anything, I would be as much opposed to the bill as any one.

Mr. HEILMAN. I am very glad to see so many gentlemen ready to protect the interests of the Government of the United States. It was only last week that a great many of those very gentlemen were voting in the interest of the bloated bullion-holders and against the interests of the Government. They have changed mightily since then, and I am very glad of it. This bill is simply a money-making proposition for the District of Columbia. It is a bill to allow the District to sell low interest-bearing bonds for the purpose of redeeming other bonds now due bearing 7 or 8 per cent. interest. As I said before, this bill was drawn with a great deal of care, is all right, and ought to pass as it came from the committee.

Mr. SAMFORD. I now call the previous question upon the bill and the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the following amendment:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to make the Government of the United States liable for either the principal or the interest of said bonds or any part thereof

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAMFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the interchange of subsidiary coins for legal-tender money under certain circumstances, to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 595) to amend an act for the relief of Joseph P. Collins, approved March 3, 1879.

SPECIAL-IMPROVEMENT TAXES, ETC.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 1379) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of general taxes and assessments for special improvements now due to the District of Columbia, and for a revision of assessments for special improvements.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the rate of interest to be collected of any person owing arrearages of general taxes or assessments for special improvements now due to and the liens for which are held by the District of Columbia, shall be 6 per cent. per annum in lieu of the rate and penalties now fixed by law: Provided, This provision shall apply only to taxes and assessments paid on or before the 1st day of October, 1879.

SEC. 2. Where property has been sold under tax sales and bought in by any other party than the District of Columbia, or where any third person has acquired tax-lien certificates or special-assessment certificates, the parties owning the property thus sold, or on which such certificates may have been acquired, may tender to the purchaser or holder of said certificates, on or before the 1st day of October, 1879, the amount due and 6 per cent. interest, which, when received, shall be in full of principal, interest, and penalties attached thereto by law.

SEC. 3. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed, upon written complaint being made to them within sixty days from the passage of this act, by any person or persons who had, prior to June 19, 1878, paid their special-improvement taxes prepared under an act of the Legislative Assembly of said District, of August 10, 1871, that their said assessment or assessments were erroneous or excessive, to revise and correct such assessments so complained of; and in case the amount of any such assessment is found to be erroneous or excessive, the commissioner shall issue to the person entitled to the same a drawback certificate for the amount of such excessive or erroneous charge, which certificate shall be received in payment of all special assessments for which no special-assessment certificates have been issued, and which are not pledged for any existing obligation, and for all general taxes due before the 1st day of July, 1877.

SEC. 4. That hereafter the date of publication of notice of sale for delinquent taxes provided for in section 5 of "an act for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, shall be as follows:

For the tax year ending June 30, 1879, said notice of sale shall be published on the first Tuesday of November, 1879, and for each subsequent year on the first Tuesday in September of each such year.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The District commissioners in their last report called the attention of Congress to the large amount of unpaid general and special taxes in the District. Many of these taxes have been so augmented by interest and by accumulated penalties as to make their collection very difficult if not impossible. For the purpose of facilitating the collection of these taxes, and as a partial measure of relief to the tax-payers of the District, this bill has been prepared.

The first section of the bill provides for reducing the rate of interest on all unpaid general and special taxes from 10 per cent. to 6 per cent., and provides that this rate when paid shall be in lieu of the rate and penalties now fixed by law. By recent legislation of Congress all special assessments for improvements in this District have been abolished, and the rate of interest on general taxes is now reduced to 6 per cent. In so far, then, as this Congress can be said to have any established policy in relation to its legislation for this District, this bill is in accord with that policy.

The first section applies only to cases where the certificates are held by the District. But there is another class of certificates which are held by third parties. The second section of the bill permits these parties to accept 6 per cent. interest in lieu of accumulated penalties, and legalizes such agreement when made. We do not as a committee think it best to intervene between these parties or to interfere with the vested rights of those who have purchased these tax liens or special-assessment certificates. This section is permissive in its character.

The third section of the bill provides for a revision of assessments which have been paid in special-assessment cases. By the act of June 11, 1878, all special assessments then unpaid were submitted for revision to the District commissioners. This section provides that such revision shall apply also to all assessments paid prior to the passage of the act of June 11, 1878. It seems to the committee that such provision is entirely equitable and just.

The fourth section of the bill merely changes the time of advertising special-assessment taxes and general taxes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Allow me to ask the gentleman what is the reason for a revision of these assessments? Were they incorrect? Were they improperly made? Was there abuse in any way?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Experience has shown that upon an average about 30 per cent. of these taxes were erroneously assessed. The revision which has already taken place upon unpaid assessments shows that these assessments to the extent of fully 30 per cent. were erroneously made.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know what the gentleman means when he says that experience has shown this. At the time the assessments were made I presume there was a market valuation. I do not apprehend the gentleman's meaning.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. The act of June 19, 1878, provided for a revision of these assessments in relation to their character and amount. When I speak of what has been shown by experience I mean that upon a revision of those assessments the commissioners have found that upon the average 30 per cent. were erroneously assessed. The amount was erroneous, the calculations were erroneous in various ways—as to the amount of property and as to other elements which entered into the assessment.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. With the consent of the gentleman I would like to offer the following amendment:

At the end of the third section add the following:

Provided, That complaints filed under the act of June 19, 1878, paid or unpaid, by a property holder, his agent or attorney, need not be refiled under this act.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I have no objection to that.

The amendment of Mr. DE LA MATYR was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I confess that I have not become thoroughly enlightened upon this bill. I did not hear well the statement of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. ALDRICH.] This certainly is a dangerous kind of legislation and involves some questions of very great importance. I would like to hear further explanation. I do not wish to imply that the explanation of the gentleman from Rhode Island was not sufficient, but I was unable to hear it, he was standing so far in front of me.

Mr. HENKLE. Mr. Speaker, having been a member of the Committee for the District of Columbia for a number of years and being consequently more familiar, perhaps, than some other gentlemen are with the affairs of the District, I think I can explain the provisions of this bill in a satisfactory manner to gentlemen who want light upon it.

The first section provides that the rate of interest on arrears of special assessments shall be 6 per cent. The original act provided a very much higher rate of interest, varying, I believe, from 12 per cent. to 20 and 24 per cent. The constitutionality and justice of the act by which these special assessments were made were called in question by a great many citizens of the District, and to a considerable extent the assessments were not paid. They have been in dispute for a number of years until the interest at this high rate amounts in many instances to 50 per cent. or more of the original principal.

It is a great hardship in very many cases that the property-holders of the District are required to pay these special assessments, because in many instances the property instead of being improved has positively been injured and rendered less valuable than it was before. It has therefore been thought proper—equitable in every sense—that we should relieve these tax-payers so far as possible, certainly by the reduction of the rate of interest to a reasonable rate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] to say that these assessments have been from 30 to 40 per cent. too high, and I would like to know how much is to be lost to the Government by reason of the refund of 30 or 40 per cent of these taxes?

Mr. SAMFORD. I did not so understand the gentleman from Rhode Island. I understood him to say that about 30 per cent. of these assessments were excessive, not that there was an excess of 30 or 40 per cent. on the whole amount. He said that about 30 per cent. of the assessments were excessive.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I would like to ask what amount of money is likely to be refunded under this bill?

Mr. HENKLE. The object of this bill is to relieve the property-holders, the tax-payers of this District, from the payment of exorbitant rates of interest on these special assessments now unpaid.

In reply to the question asked by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT,] I will say that these special-assessment taxes were in very many cases erroneous and excessive.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does not the question whether the taxes were too high or too low amount to just this, that there was a difference of opinion between the board of public works and the present commissioners as to what was the proper assessment?

Mr. SAMFORD. That is a question of proof, such as arises very frequently where there has been an overassessment for purposes of taxation.

Mr. COX. What is the amount involved in this matter? What will be the rebate?

Mr. HENKLE. I will endeavor to answer each gentleman in his turn.

Now in regard to these erroneous and excessive assessments I will illustrate. Here is a man owning a corner lot, fronting twenty feet on one street and perhaps one hundred feet on another. The adjoining lot has a front of twenty feet. There may not be much difference in the value of the lots. A corner lot is generally worth something more than the adjoining lot. But in this case the assessment was made at so much per front foot; and in the assessment of the corner lot the front and the side were both counted, making the assessment upon the corner lot in some instances six times as much as the assessment on an adjoining lot of the same area and perhaps not much less valuation. This system of assessment was manifestly unfair and unjust; and the object of the bill is to remedy abuses that have grown up in this way.

Mr. BLOUNT. Had the tax-payer any opportunity to make issue at the time in the disputed cases?

Mr. HENKLE. None in the world. The condition of affairs in the District of Columbia at that time was such that it was utterly impossible for the average tax-payer to get redress of grievances. This is known to every one who is familiar with the affairs of the District of Columbia at that time.

Mr. HORR. Was there no board of equalization in this District?

Mr. HENKLE. There was not then, or if so, such a board existed only in name, and citizens could get no redress. I could refer the gentleman to a large number of individual instances of gross abuse and outrage growing out of the system practiced in the District. The calculation for the improvements upon which these special assessments were based were extravagant, erroneous, and enormous, as the history of the past abundantly shows. Remeasurements of the work by competent engineers show in very many instances the estimates upon which these assessments were made were three and four times what they actually should have been. In other cases, and various other respects too tedious to mention, in hundreds of instances, the assessments were out of all proportion to the value of the property.

The plan of Washington is an irregular one. Two streets sometimes intersect at a sharp angle, and a man who lives at their intersection has to my knowledge been assessed double for the improvement, for instance, of New York avenue and Pennsylvania avenue, because his property happened to look out on both those avenues, when in justice and equity he should have been assessed only for one of them. It is in order to revise and correct and readjust such erroneous assessments that the District Committee have labored assiduously during the last four years. I know when District business is brought up in this House——

Mr. HORR. What will be the amount of rebate under this bill?

Mr. HENKLE. It is impossible to state what the amount of rebate will be. The committee have not estimated. They are satisfied it is only just that a remedy should be provided. The present assessments are unequal, unfair, and unjust; and they have thought the Government could afford to do justice, even if it should cost a considerable amount to the balance of the tax-payers of the District.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the last Congress, the Forty-fifth Congress, there was a bill passed which provided a remedy for those who had not paid their special-assessment taxes. Those which remained unpaid the District commissioners were authorized to revise and readjust, which they have proceeded to do. As my friend from Rhode Island has said, they have found as a general thing that the assessments were on the average about 30 or 40 per cent. in excess of what they should have been. Under the provisions of that bill those who refrained from paying and disputed the law in the courts got the benefit of that rebate or reduction of 30 or 40 per cent.

But there was another class, and most of them men in moderate circumstances who did not wish to become involved in litigation, who did not understand matters of law and who, for fear of embarrassing the titles to their property, came forward promptly, at great expense and inconvenience, and paid their assessments. The object of this bill is to give relief to them. They are the more meritorious of the two classes. They paid their money; they have had no relief provided under the act of the Forty-fifth Congress. This provides relief to those who paid. The former bill provided relief for those only who did not pay. So with the two bills we will have relief for both classes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Why in the same bill did they not provide for both cases?

Mr. HENKLE. For this reason, that it is an exceedingly difficult matter to get legislation on anything which pertains to the District of Columbia through this House. Whenever business pertaining to the District of Columbia is called there is immediately a restlessness manifested on the part of the House, and in about an hour we find ourselves without a quorum and some great objector raises the objection we have no quorum. Then the House is adjourned. The Committee for the District of Columbia have tried to do their level best. We thought we could not at the last Congress secure the passage of the bill to cure the whole subject. The most urgent part was to cure that outstanding and unsettled. We succeeded in passing that bill. Now we ask the House, as a mere matter of justice to these good people who came forward years ago and paid their money, that if they have paid excessively, if they have paid erroneous assessments, they shall have a certificate issued to them for the excess, which may be used hereafter toward paying their taxes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is to put those who have paid on an equality with those who have not paid.

Mr. HENKLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Maryland complains this House is careless of its legislation with respect to this District; that we fail to make a quorum; that we are altogether neglectful of this District. I dissent from that opinion. We have seldom failed to give a special hour to this District on a certain day. Our rules require that on a particular Monday after a particular hour the business of the District of Columbia shall be proceeded with and all other business shall be set aside. They have had persuasive eloquence always in their favor. They have really more men to represent them here than if they were really represented. The history of the legislation of the District of Columbia can be illustrated by a figure. It is like a machine which I have seen in Connecticut, where if you put your finger in your hand goes in, and when your hand goes in, in goes your arm, and when they get your arm into the machine, in goes your whole body. That is a good metaphor to illustrate this District of Columbia legislation.

A MEMBER. What is it?

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is listening to me he can tell what it is which those Yankees have invented; he can give you the technical name. Last year we passed a bill for the relief of those who had never paid their assessment taxes. Am I right in that statement?

Mr. HENKLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. That was the beginning of this machine movement. Now they come in and ask that all those who did not pay, to the amount of $1,800,000 as I am informed by a member of the District of Columbia Committee, shall be relieved. If there be the same rate of deduction this year as last, it will be 30 per cent. This bill really involves, therefore, a refunding of $500,000 to those who have already paid their assessments. Why, sir, such a bill as this, such legislation as this would bring an additional blush to the faces of the red men who now observe us in the gallery.

Mr. HENKLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENKLE. If you have collected 20, 30, or 40 per cent. more than you are lawfully entitled to, do you advocate the doctrine that you should keep it simply because you have got it?

Mr. COX. I advocate the doctrine which I advocated last session, that these men who have made this Federal capital so splendid at the expense of the people of this country, at the expense of other cities and municipalities of this country, at the expense of my constituents and yours—these men who have their little elegancies in their houses taken from the General Government, who have got rich by the enhancement of the value of their property because the Federal Government is located here, who have enjoyed the largesses of the Government, not to speak of the frauds connected with this capital and its improvement—that these people have no right to come here and ask for a recoupment of what they have paid on those assessments. Why did they not show their pluck, their courage, their nerve against those who drew on this city into destructive expenditures? Ay, sir, there may be splendor in this Federal capital, there may be much to attract men here, but after all this splendor these attractions are but the meretricious signs of rottenness within.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to know how the passage of this bill will entail any debt upon the Government of the United States?

Mr. COX. I presume this is a part of the general system pursued as to this District, the effect of which will be in the long run to make the United States Government liable for all the debts of this District, as it is now sought to make it liable for one-half of the interest, and perhaps it will be sought very soon to make it liable for the principal. I am for stopping the thing on the threshold. I know that there are good, considerate, fair men, like my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] who advocate these measures. But it is about time to stop and call a halt; and if we cannot get a quorum here, better table these bills until we can have good legislation, or at least the old-fashioned municipal government of this city of Washington, instead of making that city merely an appendage to the General Government in such a way that we shall bear all the burdens while the people of the District shall have all the benefit.

Mr. HEILMAN. This speech-making, Mr. Speaker, is all very fine as far as it goes, but I submit that it does not settle this question of delinquent taxes. Here is a large amount of delinquent taxes that ought to be adjusted in some way or other. The question of delinquent taxes is one that is not agitated in Congress merely, it has been agitated in the various States and municipalities just as well. I think this bill has been drawn with a great deal of care, and provides for an equitable adjustment of this matter. I do not think it can be much improved. The interest of the people of the District is to collect as much of these delinquent taxes as they can and then start anew. I think the bill ought to pass just as it is, having been very carefully matured by the committee.

Mr. NEAL rose.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] has been recognized.

Mr. NEAL. What the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] may have said in regard to the management of the affairs of the District of Columbia may be very true, but it has no application to this bill. The question which the committee had to consider and which this Congress must take upon the report of the committee was whether injustice had been done to the property-owners by these assessments. Now, there is not a member of Congress who has been here prior to this session who does not know that it is the fact that gross injustice has been done in making these assessments on the property-owners. Only a few days ago a poor woman called me out of this Hall and told me that her property was actually confiscated; that all the home she had in the world was taken from her in consequence of these fraudulent assessments.

Now, what is proposed in this bill? That persons who have paid these assessments may have the amounts corrected so that they may pay only what they actually owe. Some persons had refused to pay their assessments, while other persons had come forward and paid up their taxes like men; and now these latter ask Congress that justice shall be done them; that they shall be placed upon a par with the citizens of this city who have not paid their taxes, but who were relieved by the act of the Forty-fifth Congress. All that this bill proposes to do is to give these men partial relief; that they may not be required to pay more money than they ought to have paid on a fair and just valuation. It seems to me nothing has addressed itself more to the equity and conscience of the members of this House than this bill does.

Now, in regard to the form of government of this District, which the gentleman has seen fit to criticise, I might agree with him that some form of municipal government would be better, but this city occupies an anomalous position in this nation; it is the city of the nation; half of the property is owned by the people of the country, and they cannot afford to have the citizens of Washington control it to the exclusion of the Government itself. Whether this be a good form of government or not it will devolve upon this Congress to determine, because bills are pending now, and others will be introduced before we adjourn, to make radical changes; and I trust the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] who must have had great experience in the management of municipal affairs, will bring to bear that experience and his wisdom in order that we may establish a government here which will be such an embodiment of human wisdom as will answer the purpose for all time to come.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say one word in regard to the bill under consideration. I fear an impression may have been made upon the minds of some members of the House, from the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] that this bill takes from the Federal Treasury a sum of money, and that if the House pass this bill it entails upon the Federal Government some sort of indebtedness; and when I asked the gentleman from New York to tell me how that could occur, his answer was that he presumed that in the future there would be some bill passed to saddle the Federal Treasury with this debt.

Now, what is going to happen in the future I do not know, and I presume the gentleman from New York cannot tell, but this I do know, and I state it with emphasis to the House, that under no construction that can be given to this bill can it entail one single dollar of indebtedness upon the United States Government; because we know that the District of Columbia has to raise by taxation one-half of the expenses of the government of the District, and it has to be raised by the people of the District. Whether this assessment is corrected or not, it is an effort on the part of the House by the Committee for the District of Columbia to extend to the parties who paid up their special assessments the same measure of relief and justice as was extended in the last Congress to those who had not paid.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman concur in the argument of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENKLE] when I asked him why this was not included in the measure of the last year; he answered that he preferred to give it in broken doses?

Mr. HUNTON. I do not propose to give any such answer as that. My understanding is that this feature embodied in this bill is casus omissus in the last bill, and if my mind had recurred to this branch of the subject I for one would have labored to put this provision in the bill of last year. Those who paid up their taxes were not clamorous before the committee like those who had not paid their taxes; hence I presume the attention of the committee was not called to them for that reason; but they stand on the same footing and are entitled to more consideration than those who have been relieved, and they should be relieved, because they stepped forward and paid what the law of the District required them to pay.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman say what is the amount to be refunded?

Mr. HUNTON. I do not know.

Mr. COX. Will it approximate a half million dollars?

Mr. HUNTON. I think not.

Mr. COX. If the half of this money is to be paid by taxes on the people of the District, as the gentleman says, where will the other half come from?

Mr. SAMFORD. As I understand it, there is not a single cent which is required to be paid by the Government under this bill. However true what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] may be, and however much I may agree with him in what he says—and I agree with most that he does say—the law now on the statute-book was passed before this present committee came into Congress; but that does not answer the question of removing the wrong which the committee is seeking now to relieve.

We find that during the period of several years the authorities of this District made erroneous and excessive assessments; we find in many instances, Mr. Speaker, if we are to be governed by the evidence before the committee, which is overwhelming, that some of the citizens of this District have been taxed almost completely out of their property, and they have nowhere to go except to Congress for protection.

We find also in addition to that a law passed at the last Congress, under which law those who rebelled against their overassessments and refused to pay taxes had a right to have the righteousness of that assessment examined and to have the assessment lowered. But as was said by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. HENKLE,] some of these citizens did not do that, but went forward and promptly paid their assessments, and they paid their money under an erroneous and excessive exaction which they could not resist, except by open defiance of law, as these levies were made under the form of law.

Now, I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] what remedy will you give? This bill simply relieves the 10 per cent. penalty, and requires them to pay a 6 per cent. penalty wherever they have been overassessed. Where they have paid their assessments we say that the District commissioners shall give them back certificates with which to pay back taxes. Is not that just? If you will not settle the question upon the basis of justice, to whom must they appeal? We have the power to refuse to grant them a hearing even, and of course can refuse to accord them justice; but is that right?

Now, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, not one single dollar in money is to be paid back, and the payment is to be in the shape of certificates which may be used for the purpose of paying taxes. When we arrive at the conclusion that this is just, fair, and right we should not then be controlled by any question of expediency and ignore the interests of those parties who came forward and paid their taxes, which were unjustly and unrighteously demanded.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAMFORD. Certainly.

Mr. COX. I want the attention of the House to the question which

I now ask the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD.] If there is a refunding of this amount, does not one-half of it come out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. SAMFORD. I fear that may be possibly the case ultimately unless Congress shall properly amend the existing law, which it ought to do.

Mr. COX. Is it not certain as now fixed by law?

Mr. SAMFORD. Well, as I said, we are dealing with the law which we find upon the statute-book, for which the committee is not responsible. While I concede that that law is wrong, and I am ready to vote to repeal or amend it, and while ultimately some of this money may come out of the Federal Government, unless we prevent it by proper legislation, because these tax certificates may be used to pay taxes, and to that extent the taxes will be that much less, that is no reason why these tax-payers should not have relief from an oppressive burden, imposed under a law against which they protested and which Congress imposed upon them.

Mr. HUNTON. Why, my dear sir, this cannot come out of the Federal Government.

Mr. SAMFORD. Then the Federal Government can in no event be liable as the law now stands?

Mr. HUNTON. Not a bit of it.

Mr. SAMFORD. Will not the taxes raised by the citizens of the District be that much less?

Mr. HUNTON. Stop a minute, my friend. The District has to raise by taxation one-half of the expenses of the District government.

Mr. SAMFORD. Certainly; I understand that.

Mr. HUNTON. How it is raised is a matter of no concern to the Federal Government.

Mr. SAMFORD. Suppose that one-half of these taxes are paid in these tax certificates, what then?

Mr. HUNTON. They would not be paid to the Federal Government but will be paid to the District government; and the District government will be obliged to make up that half from somewhere else.

Mr. SAMFORD. Allow me to illustrate, for I hope there may be no liability on the Federal Government. Suppose the expenses estimated by the commissioners of this District should be $3,000,000. Then suppose that you have issued back-tax certificates to the amount of half a million of dollars. Now, the citizens of the District must raise $1,500,000 of the expenditures of the District. Suppose that one-half a million of that one and a half millions is paid in these back certificates. The Government of the United States will pay $1,500,000 in money toward the expenses of this District, while the citizens of the District will pay only $1,000,000 in money. Will that be the effect of the law as it now stands?

Mr. HUNTON. I beg pardon; you are entirely mistaken. If the expenses of the District government be $3,000,000 per annum, the Federal Government will pay of that amount $1,500,000, and under no circumstances will it be called upon to pay another dollar. The District will pay $1,500,000 of that $3,000,000, and under no circumstances can it get along with paying one dollar less. Now, that is a matter which the District must manage by taxation, and if it relieves one portion of its people or its property from taxation, then it must raise the amount from some other portion of its people or its property. The District must raise one and a half millions of dollars in money, no matter where it comes from.

Mr. SAMFORD. Then I understand if the commissioners of the District make their estimate of the expenditures of the District, which estimate is submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, if that estimate is for about $3,000,000, one and a half millions will come out of the Federal Treasury, and one and a half millions will come out of the District. Now, if you issue these back-tax certificates, receivable for taxes to the amount of half a million of dollars, and the citizens, when the District applies to them for taxes, pay those taxes in, these back-tax certificates——

Mr. HUNTON. If the District government receive these back-tax certificates in payment of taxes, then it must increase the tax on other property in order to make up the full amount. The government of the District must raise one and a half million dollars in money.

Mr. SAMFORD. If that is the fact, then the objection made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] does not apply at all——

Mr. HUNTON. It does not apply at all.

Mr. SAMFORD. Because not one cent comes out of the Federal Treasury. Now, Mr. Speaker, under the extravagant, if not profligate, régime of the past few years we find citizens of this District who have upon them burdens of taxation which they cannot bear, imposed by law-makers over whom they had no control, asking Congress to legislate for them some relief. The distinguished chairman of the committee assures us this law can in no wise make a charge upon the Federal Treasury, and that they may be relieved without even the necessity at this time of amending the law of which I have already spoken. And I think the bill ought to pass.

I know the act of June, 1878, which requires the United States Government to pay half the current expenses of the District had the support of good men. Indeed I have heard several gentlemen during this session defend it on the ground that the national capital should be grand and magnificent in its appointments. To this doctrine I cannot subscribe, and shall embrace the first opportunity I am allowed to give my reasons for my position.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. A large portion of this discussion has been addressed to the wisdom of the past action of Congress. Every time any question relating to this District has been before the House this session we have had the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and other gentlemen questioning whether the act of last year establishing a permanent form of government for the District was right or just. A very large portion of this debate has been devoted to that question, which I submit should be entirely eliminated from the discussion.

In answer to the objection of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that the third section of this bill contemplates an appropriation or expenditure on the part of the Federal Government, I will say that there is nothing of the kind contemplated. I cannot conceive of any contingency under which the Government can possibly be called upon to pay one cent under the operation of the third section of this bill. This section provides that the excess of revised assessments shall be paid for, not in cash, but in drawback certificates which are made receivable for the payment of any outstanding assessments or taxes levied prior to the 1st day of July, 1879.

Now, what are the facts in relation to these unpaid taxes? There are some $2,000,000 of certificates or assessments now outstanding, and these are held and pledged to pay $750,000 of the obligations of the District. Whatever amount of drawback certificates may be issued under the third section will be deducted from the $2,000,000 certificates which I have referred to, and no amount which may be issued can possibly make such a reduction as to call upon the United States or the District for any special appropriation in that direction. This I believe answers the only objection which gentlemen on the other side have urged to the bill.

It is said that it is time for us to stop; to "call a halt." Sir, this Congress has already wisely or unwisely—as I believe wisely—provided by the act of June 11, 1878, which is now before me, that all unpaid assessments should be revised and that such portion of them as should be decided by the commissioners to be excessive or erroneous should be remitted. Now we ask you to apply this same principle to the people who had paid their taxes prior to the passage of the act providing for a revision. Will this House adopt the principle that men shall be punished for diligence, for promptness in paying their taxes? This is exactly what the House will do if it refuses to extend to persons who have paid their special-assessment and other taxes the same measure of relief, founded in justice and equity, that has already been extended to people who have refused or neglected to pay.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman one question: where certificates are given to persons who have already paid their taxes, for what taxes are those certificates receivable?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I read from the bill:

> Which certificate shall be received in payment of all special assessments for which no special-assessment certificates have been issued, and which are not pledged for any existing obligation, and for all general taxes due before the 1st day of July, 1877.

Mr. REAGAN. Does not that sustain the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD,] that the certificates issued for overassessments will come back and be paid into the Treasury to balance an equal amount to be paid by the General Government?

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. No, sir; not by any means.

Mr. REAGAN. The Federal Government bears one-half of the taxation of the District according to the act creating a permanent form of government. Now, if the citizens of the District are allowed to pay in something else than money——

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. They cannot pay in anything else than money, except on account of these unpaid taxes due prior to July 1, 1877.

Mr. BLOUNT. At which time the present law in regard to the liability of the General Government was not in force.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. That is the very point. The present law in regard to the liability of the General Government was not then in force; and these unpaid special and general taxes were and are solely and entirely the property of the District, and the District alone is entitled to receive the proceeds from their collection.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand, however, that these certificates are to be receivable for all special and general assessments hereafter to be made, as well as heretofore made.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. No, sir; the gentleman is entirely mistaken on that point also. Congress has declared that no special assessment shall hereafter be made; we have discontinued the system of special assessments—very properly, I think. If no further discussion is desired I demand the previous question.

Mr. HENKLE. Allow me to add just one word. Since this discussion began I have ascertained that there is an abundant fund, a fund which will be more than sufficient by half a million of dollars, to satisfy these rebates, after paying for all these improvements.

Mr. COX. I think that after the diversity of views developed on the part of members of the committee the House had better adjourn and give us an opportunity to read up on this matter. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the House will not adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COX, there were—ayes 46, noes 68.

Mr. COX. I call for tellers.

Mr. HEILMAN. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the motion. This bill ought to be passed.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 70, noes 35.

Mr. COBB. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COX. I think we ought to have a record on this question; some day or other it will be useful.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move to amend the title of the bill by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. HUNTON. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. MARTIN.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York rises to a privileged question. He will state it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a resolution providing for the final adjournment of Congress.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That cannot interfere with the District business, which was fixed for to-day by special order of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD?]

Mr. HUNTON. I do not yield; and I do not concede that his motion is a privileged question as against the business of the District of Columbia, which was assigned for to-day, beginning at two o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that the proposition of the gentleman from New York cannot interrupt the business of the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I call the attention of the Chair to the rule on page 93 of the Digest, by which he will perceive that this is a higher question of privilege than the business which the Committee for the District of Columbia was allowed to report after two o'clock to-day. I submit that a resolution fixing a day for the final adjournment of Congress has a superior right to recognition by the Chair over the business on which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] claims the floor at this time.

Mr. COX. I desire to say this, that to-day has been fixed for the consideration of business from the District Committee, and under the rules of the House, at the time fixed for the consideration of that business, the Committee for the District of Columbia always has had the right to take anybody off the floor in order to have that business proceeded with. It has been so decided by all the Speakers, and although I do not favor the reports from this District Committee, nevertheless I think we should give them a chance, as they so frequently complain of not having an opportunity to bring their bills before the House. I am not in a hurry to adjourn, anyhow. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTON. When two o'clock to-day was reached, Mr. Speaker, the call of the roll was suspended to execute the order of the House in reference to the business of the District Committee. Now, the motion of the gentleman from New York could not have interrupted a roll-call. There are only two other bills, which will take but a short time, and I hope the gentleman from New York will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. This will not take ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.) The Chair is of the opinion that the Committee for the District of Columbia is entitled under the order of the House to the time during this legislative day after two o'clock, or so long as it shall claim the floor. The rule of the House provides that when the hour fixed for the consideration of business of the District Committee arrives, the time of the House until adjournment of that day shall, when claimed by the Committee for the District of Columbia, be devoted exclusively to business reported from said committee. The House is now acting under a special order for the consideration of District business, the same as if this were the third Monday of the month, or District day, and Rule 82 applies to this day, under the special order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Let me suggest to the Chair that he has already recognized my colleague to make a motion to adjourn. Now, does the Speaker hold that the motion to adjourn is not a question of higher privilege than that pending on a report from the District Committee? If, then, a motion to adjourn is in order and privileged, the rule states that pending a motion to adjourn it is in order to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, and it is equally in order to fix the day for the final adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is always in order, and is specially recognized as in order for the purpose of terminating the District business under Rule 82.

Mr. MCMAHON. A motion to adjourn is other business.

Mr. COX. A motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. A motion to fix the day for final adjournment has always been held to be a question of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee for the District of Columbia have exclusive control of the floor during the remainder of the legislative day fixed for the consideration of that business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Pardon me for saying, Mr. Speaker, that under that ruling this House could never adjourn until the business of the District committee had been completed. If they are entitled to the legislative day it is without limit so long as that business shall last. Then if the gentleman rose to move the House adjourn the Chair would say it was not in order as the House had determined it should transact no other business but the business of the District Committee.

Mr. COX. The motion to adjourn is not business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Neither is the motion to fix the day to which they will adjourn.

Mr. COX. That is other business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It is not business in the contemplation of the rule for the House to fix the hour and day of final adjournment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read Rule 82.

The Clerk read as follows:

82. It shall be the duty of the Committee for the District of Columbia to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching the said District as shall be presented, or shall come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient. The third Monday of each month, from the hour of two o'clock p. m. until the adjournment of that day, shall, when claimed by the Committee for the District of Columbia, be devoted exclusively to business reported from said committee; and said committee shall henceforth be omitted by the Speaker in the regular call of committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Now the House is operating under the same order provided for in this rule.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to ask the Chair a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Suppose the Senate should send to this House a resolution that the two Houses should adjourn to-morrow sine die at twelve o'clock m., does the Chair pretend to rule that that would not be in order to the exclusion of all other business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does so rule. The House would have to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, in the first place, in order to get the resolution up. The Chair desires to state that pending this order of the House, which was deemed of so high a privilege that it interfered with the roll-call, no other business is in order but the business of the District Committee. It is of such a high privilege that it prevented even the continuation of the roll-call.

The Chair does not see how it can be interfered with in the way proposed. The Chair will state further that the special assignment for District business under Rule 82 is of the same character as the morning hour on Mondays. But one hour a week is allowed for the introduction of bills, and ever since that rule has been in existence the Chair has declined to entertain even a request for unanimous consent to transact any other business within the time prescribed. So of District business. Only one day in each month, or that part of the day after two o'clock, is allowed for such business. It would be manifestly against the letter and spirit of the rule to allow other privileged questions to consume this time. Hence in determining the priority of privileged questions, (and District business is privileged for a certain day under Rule 82,) that business must be first disposed of, which, under the rule, is to be considered to the exclusion of all other business. For these reasons the Chair sustains the point of order, and holds that the gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee for the District, is entitled to the floor, to report business from that committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Everybody wanted the roll-call stopped, as the morning hour had expired, and no question was raised upon it.

Mr. HUNTON. I understand the Chair has decided the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided the question.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I desire to know whether the whole time this evening which should be devoted to the District business is to be taken up by a discussion of a point of order which has already been decided.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I wish to ask the Chair a parliamentary question, and it is this, whether he holds it is not in order to interrupt this business now before the House under the order of the House that the Committee of Ways and Means shall report in reference to the final adjournment? I desire an answer from the Speaker to that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not decide any question until it shall arise. The Chair has already decided that the Committee for the District of Columbia is now entitled to the floor, and that District business is in order to the exclusion of all other business. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

INSPECTOR OF PLUMBING.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1894) authorizing the employment of an inspector of plumbing in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, on recommendation of the health officer, an inspector of plumbing for said District, whose duty it shall be, under direction of the health officer, to inspect all houses in course of erection, and pass upon the plumbing and sewerage of said houses. And the health officer of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized, under direction of the commissioners, to execute and enforce regulations governing plumbing, house drainage, and the ventilation of house sewers; and any person who shall neglect or refuse to comply with the requirements of the said regulations when promulgated shall be punishable by a fine of from twenty-five to two hundred dollars for each and every such offense, or in default of payment of fine to imprisonment for thirty days.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I ask to have read in connection with this bill a paper which explains the reasons for the necessity of the appointment of this inspector, written by the health officer of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The subject of house drainage is one which of late years has taken a fast hold upon the minds of sanitarians in all our principal cities and the necessity for an inspection of all plumbing work, as provided for in this bill, is witnessed by the fact that at the present time efforts are being made both in the General Assembly of New York and the city council of Baltimore to get legislation covering the subject.

There is no class of work attendant upon the building of a structure intended for use as a human habitation which needs such careful supervision in the interest of the health and lives of those who may occupy it afterward as does the work of the plumber. No fact rests upon a broader and more substantial basis of truth than that the gaseous emanations from decomposing sewage, commonly called sewer gas, are a fruitful source of disease.

Whatever the agency by which it works, we know that it comes with the power and potency of death. Escaping into the free atmosphere its deadly power is quickly destroyed by the oxidation of its organic poisons; but when it mingles with the confined air of our unventilated living and sleeping rooms it retains its deadly power long enough to do its work effectually.

Dr. Mapother, of Dublin, an eminent authority, states that there occur annually in England one hundred and forty thousand cases of typhoid fever, of which twenty thousand terminate fatally, which are clearly traceable to defective drainage and sewer-gas poisoning; and yet typhoid fever is only one of a long list of prevalent zymotic diseases.

Bayliss, in his valuable work on house drainage, says:

"If we look for the cause of the large mortality from zymotic diseases in our cities we find it principally in sewer-gas poisoning. Other causes operate to swell the total, but to bad plumbing work we may attribute the prevalence of pythogenie pneumonia, peritonitis, inflammatory rheumatism, typhoid and malarial fevers, croup, diphtheria, and many kindred diseases which are almost epidemic in all our large cities.

"Unfortunately for the progress of sanitary reform the difference between good and bad plumbing work is usually so slight as to escape the notice of any but a trained expert, but it is commonly great enough to exert an active and far-reaching power for mischief."

Let us follow the intelligent sanitary inspector in an examination of the pipe systems of an average New York and Washington house of the better class. In the drainage system and its appurtenances we see dependence for the suppression of gases, often held under considerable pressure in the sewers, placed upon supposititious half-inch water-seals in traps of such shape and so placed that they are likely to be emptied every hour in the day and stand empty during the night. We find that the foul sewer is provided with breathing-holes into our houses; that in dark, unventilated recesses adjoining our bed-rooms are cheap and flimsy water-closets, wrong in principle and wholly unsatisfactory in operation, retaining so much of the filth passing into them that they become pestilential nuisances. In short, we find every condition so favorable to sewer-gas poisoning that we no longer wonder at the great mortality from diseases of pythogenie origin. As the plumbing work of our houses is commonly done, it would do better for most of us if we had to bring our water in buckets from a public hydrant and carry our waste to the culvert at the nearest street corner.

The plumber's work is covered by the builder and at once hidden from sight. In a few months, sometimes weeks, the occupant of the house complains of an obstructed sewer, a leak in the soil-pipe, a troublesome odor that cannot be accounted for, or some other of the numerous evils that follow in the wake of "scamped" plumbing.

The inspector investigates and finds a pipe of insufficient size, the joints put together with common mortar instead of cement, improperly laid, so that joints have opened; a pipe perhaps broken in the laying and left with an opening for escape of gases; no trap perhaps under sink or closet, or the bath-tub connected with soil-pipe below the trap.

The finding of defects in the private sewers of our houses is of every-day occurrence. If the daily report of one of our inspectors is without such a case it is an exception. It has not been one month since an inspection of a row of houses in the northeastern section of our city, made at the request of some person suffering, revealed the fact that not one of the sinks connecting with sewer was supplied with proper traps. It was but last week that a family was forced to leave a house on F street, between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets, on account of the terrible nuisance created by a defectively constructed private sewer; and these things are of daily occurrence, and will continue so long as some law is not placed upon the statute-books making a misdemeanor of the reckless criminality which characterizes some of our plumbing work. I can earnestly say with a former health officer of this District, "That such a law does not stand prominent upon the pages of the code of every city is a disgraceful reproach upon the intelligence and civilization of the present age." We would bring to speedy punishment the druggist who carelessly dispenses poisons, or the grocer who fraudulently sells deleterious compounds, but permit a plumber, and pay him well, to open a direct communication between our chambers and the general receptacle of the foul drainage of our city, trusting to his honor for protection, and he goes unpunished for his fraudulent practices, while we ignorantly allow the health, life perhaps, of our family to be sacrificed by his neglect.

Under this bill, if passed, an inspector would be appointed whose duty it would be to see that every house erected in future should have the plumbing work done under certain wholesome regulations—regulations which would require the use of proper material, proper construction, adequate ventilation of sewers, and the employment of all proper means for the prevention of the return of poisonous gases from sewers into dwellings.

Is it not eminently necessary that the people have such protection? Is it not as necessary that a drain pipe of proper size and thickness be put in as it is that the house itself should have a wall of certain thickness? Is it not as just that you should protect the people by having the safeguard of proper traps to shut out this deadly gas, as it is that you should require them to build houses of certain material to protect them against the danger of fire? In short, if you make regulations to protect them against an open, avowed enemy, is there not double necessity for barricading against one who lurks in the dark and strikes where we least expect.

The Plumber and Sanitary Engineer, a monthly journal published in the city of New York, and the best paper of its class in existence, in an editorial on this subject, says:

"The only practical and permanent remedy for this difficulty is to prevent bad work by having it inspected by a competent person. The authorities should allow no house to be occupied unless thus inspected. Where defective work is afterward found they should cancel the license of the plumber who did it; if he persists in such evil practices, then send him to the penitentiary to learn the evil of his ways."

Certainly the evil is of sufficient magnitude, and prevention is both easier and better than cure.

SMITH TOWNSHEND, M. D.,
Health Officer.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the previous question is moved I desire to call the attention of the gentleman who reports the bill to an apparent defect in it, and ask him to permit me to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order unless the gentleman from Delaware yields.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I am not authorized by the committee to admit any amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman not allow the amendment to be read?

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I will permit it to be read.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is no provision in the bill for paying the inspector. I ask the Clerk to read the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Said inspector shall be paid by fees to be fixed by the District commissioners and charged against owners of the property inspected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Delaware yield for that amendment?

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I do not.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 64, noes 19.

So (further count not being called for) the bill was passed.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPOUNDING OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

Mr. KLOTZ, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1856) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to extend the area for the taking up and impounding of domestic animals into the county of Washington.

The bill was read. It authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to direct the taking up and impounding of domestic animals found running at large in the more densely populated suburbs of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and in such parts of the county of Washington as in their judgment may require it.

The amendments recommended by the Committee were read, as follows:

In line 4, strike out the words "direct the" and insert "prescribe rules for."

In line 5, after the word "in," strike out the balance of the section and insert "District of Columbia."

So that as amended the bill would read:

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and are hereby, authorized to provide for taking up and impounding of domestic animals found running at large in the District of Columbia.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KLOTZ moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move to amend the title by striking out the words "county of Washington" and inserting "District of Columbia."

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KLOTZ. I am authorized by the Committee for the District of Columbia to say that the committee have no more business for to-day.

Mr. KENNA. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. KENNA. I am willing to yield for that if I can be recognized afterward for a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware that he have leave to make a report from the Committee of Accounts?

Mr. BROWNE. I object.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair submits the following requests for leave of absence:

From Mr. HURD, for leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business;

From Mr. MORSE, indefinitely, on account of important business; and

From Mr. LADD, for fifteen days from June 1, on account of important business.

Mr. COFFROTH. I object.

HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I ask the Chair again to submit the request for unanimous consent that I may make a report from the Committee of Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee of Accounts. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be read, the right to object to its present consideration being reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. CARLISLE, of April 14, 1879, providing—

"That Isaac R. Hill be employed as a messenger on the floor of the House of Representatives for the present Congress and until further order, under direction of the Sergeant-at-Arms, at $1,800 a year, to be paid monthly by the Clerk of the House out of the contingent fund"— and the resolution of Mr. BLACKBURN, of April 18, 1879, providing—

"That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ, in addition to the force in his office now authorized by law, one clerk and two messengers for the present Congress and until further ordered, at salaries to be fixed and determined by the Committee of Accounts; the duty of said messengers being, among other things, to assist in keeping order upon the floor of the House; all salaries herein mentioned to be paid monthly by the Clerk of the House out of the contingent fund"— respectfully report that they have considered the same, and are agreed that to recommend the passage of the former would be to arrogate to themselves, in some measure at least, the right of nominating the employés under the control of the officers of the House.

This is a responsibility they do not feel prepared to assume, and a precedent they do not at present desire to establish. Besides, they have been assured that the end aimed at in the resolution of Mr. CARLISLE is identical in part with that sought in the resolution of Mr. BLACKBURN.

In regard to the latter resolution, the committee are unanimously of opinion that the allowance of one clerk and two messengers to the Sergeant-at-Arms in addition to the employés now authorized in his office is a greater increase of the force than the necessities of the service demand. They therefore present the following substitute for both resolutions hereinbefore mentioned, and ask its adoption by the House:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ, until otherwise ordered by the House, in addition to the force in his office now authorized by law, one clerk at $1,800 per annum and one messenger at $1,600 per annum: said messenger to assist in preserving order on the floor of the House in the absence of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to serve subpœnas, and to perform such other duties as may be assigned to him; and the salaries herein ordered shall be paid monthly out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

Mr. MILLS and others objected.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Is the report regularly before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The report was only read for information, and objection is made to its present consideration.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MURCH. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

Mr. KENNA. I made a motion to adjourn, and yielded to the gentleman from Delaware. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Maine, but if there be objection, I shall renew the motion. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MAXEY. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes, to report it with certain amendments. I ask that it be printed and lie on the table. The committee have corrected, as far as they could, the errors in the names of post-offices. The committee ask that the bill be printed, and request every Senator to examine the names of the post-offices in his own State so as to suggest to the committee any correction that may be necessary to be made. I will further say that at the earliest practicable moment after the bill is printed I shall ask that it be taken from the table and put on its passage.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 488) supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives to Congress among the several States according to the ninth census," reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 643) to amend sections 2493 and 2494 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the importation of neat cattle into the United States for breeding purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BUTLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 35) for the restoration of the books of the Beaufort Library, of South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. SAUNDERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, it was Ordered, That the memorial of citizens of Illinois, praying for certain legislation regulating the transmission of certain matter through the mails, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

ELECTIONS AND APPOINTMENTS IN RHODE ISLAND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further routine morning business, the Chair will lay before the Senate the resolutions offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.] The first resolution will be reported.

The Secretary read the first resolution, submitted by Mr. McDONALD on the 27th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene and the accompanying petition of Augustus Woodbury and other honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States and citizens of the State of Rhode Island as relates to the alleged violation of sections 1754 and 1755 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the appointment of wounded soldiers and sailors to civil offices, and also so much of said memorial as relates to alleged violations of civil-service reform in the State of Rhode Island, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, with authority to send for persons and papers.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the second resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.]

The Secretary read the second resolution, submitted by Mr. McDONALD on the 27th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene as relates to the interference of Federal officers in the election in Rhode Island and to the denial of the right to vote to any citizens of the United States who are also citizens of the State of Rhode Island, and also the alleged frauds or undue influence practiced against citizens of said State at the late election, be referred to the select committee to inquire into alleged frauds in the late elections, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not rise to object to the passage of the resolution, but there was some reference made yesterday morning, first by the Senator from Indiana who introduced the resolutions, and then by some other Senators, in regard to the basis of representation among the States. The allegation against Rhode Island was that she was entirely insufficient in numbers to entitle her to the representation that she holds in the popular branch of Congress. I had some curiosity to look over the subject in a little more extended detail than relates to Rhode Island alone, and I got some results which interested me, if they do not interest the Senate. Looking over the whole question of representation in the country, and the relative increase of population at different points since the last census was taken being shown in the votes for Representatives to Congress in 1878, I found some results which arrested my attention.

The total vote in the Northern States last year, 1878, for Representatives to Congress was 4,907,846. The total vote in the Southern States was 1,964,441. The Northern States elected one hundred and twenty-eight republicans, and opposed to the republicans, democrats and independents, or whatever name they choose to assume, there were fifty-five chosen. In the South there were one hundred democrats elected, and six who were not democrats at least when they were elected. The average vote cast in the districts of the North was 26,819. The honorable Senator from Indiana yesterday thought the average was 34,000. The average throughout the North amounted to 26,819. The average throughout the South was 18,532.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Maine ought to remember that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] is not in his seat. I suggest that he spoke of his own State alone and not of others.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not intend to misrepresent the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. EATON. I know the Senator does not.

Mr. BLAINE. I am only dealing in figures. The average I understood him to state as I have given it. The RECORD will be better evidence.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Indiana did state that as the average.

Mr. BLAINE. The RECORD will show whether I am correct or not. The average throughout the sixteen Southern States was 18,532. This average was made higher by the undoubted and very great increase in the State of Texas, by a very considerable increase in Missouri, by a strong vote in West Virginia, and by a very remarkable vote in South Carolina, on which I will not further comment at this time. After taking out those four States the average in the Southern States to each district was only 14,833.

There were in the Southern States only thirty-three districts that went above 20,000. In the Northern States there were one hundred and seventy-seven districts that went above 20,000. Any gentleman who is curious to follow those figures will see that whether you have regard to the population of the district or to the persons who voted for the sitting member the minority in the House of Representatives to-day actually represents from one hundred and fifty to two hundred and fifty thousand more voters than the so-called majority in the House of Representatives, and I do not know but three hundred thousand more.

Some of the results are really, I think, very remarkable. For instance, if you take the third, the sixth, and the eighth districts of Georgia, the seventh and eighth districts of Alabama, and the sixth and seventh districts of North Carolina, the sixth district of Kentucky, and the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth districts of Mississippi, twelve districts in all, you have an aggregate vote of 58,542. In Nebraska you have 50,247 of an aggregate vote for one Representative. In other words, twelve Representatives from as many southern districts represent the democratic party with an aggregate vote behind them of 58,542, while one republican Representative from Nebraska has behind him 50,247 votes.

Nor does this case stand alone. Alabama with eight members cast 88,000 votes; Minnesota with three members cast 99,000 votes; Virginia with nine members cast 126,000 votes; Kansas with three members cast 136,000 votes; Kentucky with ten members cast 160,000 votes; Michigan with nine members cast 281,000 votes; Louisiana with 118,000 votes sent six members; whereas Nebraska, Colorado, and Oregon all together cast 127,000 votes with three members, or the aggregate of Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, and Louisiana, reaching 544,970 votes, sent thirty-nine members, while Nebraska, Minnesota, Kansas, Michigan, Colorado, and Oregon, with an aggregate of 629,000 votes, sent only eighteen members. In other words, 544,000 votes in the South sent thirty-nine democratic members to the House of Representatives, and 629,000 votes in the North sent eighteen republican members, that is with 100,000 votes less in these Southern States than in the Northern States named they sent more than twice as many democratic Representatives as the North sent republican members. We have heard a good deal here about the small States being represented in the Senate, and the inequality of representation here, while the inequality is getting to be worse at the other end of the Capitol than it is here, if you put it upon a numerical basis, and there it ought to be exact.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like to ask the Senator if the apportionment of representation in Congress is not made upon the basis of the census of 1870?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Was not that census under the control and management of the republican party of the country?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And did not the republican party of the country fix the apportionment of members of Congress?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then the Senator ought not to complain of the results of the act of his own party.

Mr. BLAINE. But the republicans did all that on the presumption that the votes to which the Representatives were apportioned would be allowed to be cast. That is the difference. They went on the manifest but, as it has proved, baseless presumption that the voters to whom these Representatives were assigned, and in virtue of whose numbers the Representatives were given to the States, would be allowed to have an unbiased and unrestricted choice in selecting them. The honorable Senator from Delaware will probably apprehend my meaning and see that he omitted that consideration in his question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have heard intimations of that kind before.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the Senator might have heard them at any time within the last ten years.

Mr. SAULSBURY. And I give very little credit to them when I hear them. On the other hand, I might express an opinion that there have been in the Northern States a large number of votes cast that ought not to have been cast, if I saw proper to insinuate; but that would not be authority, I apprehend.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from Georgia will hardly speak of insinuation when I speak from official reports. If he chooses to insinuate, as a matter of taste he may. I do not insinuate anything; I state.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. What has the Senator from Georgia got to do with it? Has he said anything?

Mr. BLAINE. I did not say anything about the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You did say "the Senator from Georgia."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, and others, (to Mr. BLAINE.) You did say "Senator from Georgia."

Mr. BLAINE. I meant to say "Senator from Delaware."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You seem to have the Senator from Georgia on the brain.

Mr. BLAINE. Not a bit of it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. And you do not have him very correctly either.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not think in placing the Senator from Georgia along with the Senator from Delaware that I did any injustice to either.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask a question, whether in any of those States any persons were denied the right to vote on terms that were not applicable to all citizens of the United States in those States?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not understand the question.

Mr. McDONALD. Was there any qualification or disqualification of voting in any of those States that extended to one class of citizens which did not extend alike to all?

Mr. BLAINE. You mean on the statute-book?

Mr. McDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh.

Mr. McDONALD. The law.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, the law; that is not what we are talking about. We are talking about the actual numbers at the polls where districts that contain more than 30,000 lawful voters were represented and are represented to-day by men for whom 3,000 or 4,000 votes were cast. As the honorable Senator from Georgia thinks I have got him on the brain I will reproduce him again. Yesterday he pointed out the fact that there was no need of anybody else looking around, because the thing was all settled in advance.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Georgia said no such thing.

Mr. McDONALD and Mr. SAULSBURY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield, and if so to whom?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to any one who desires to interrupt me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend. Here are three Senators on the floor; to whom does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I will let the Chair decide.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir; the Chair will not decide.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Indiana was the one to whom I was yielding.

Mr. McDONALD. I have retired.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BLAINE. I do, if the Senator from Indiana has retired.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I was going to say that the Senator from Georgia said no such thing as the Senator from Maine quotes him as saying. The Senator from Georgia expresses exceeding gratification if for once in his life the Senator from Maine will quote him correctly.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Georgia is a difficult man to quote correctly; but what the Senator from Georgia yesterday asserted, whether he did it ironically or really, was that practically republicans were not allowed to vote in Georgia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is not true, again.

Mr. BLAINE. I will get the RECORD.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Georgia said no such thing. The Senator from Georgia said that everybody was allowed to vote.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, they were allowed to come out to vote when democrats were running. If a district was divided between two democrats, then the republican vote might come out; but in Georgia the record shows that when there were not two democratic candidates and an attempt was made to run a republican against a democrat, then there was a walk-over on the part of the democrats. That was the case in several districts, and I will show cases, if necessary to state figures to show it, in districts where in 1878 democrats got the certificates of election on votes very much less than the republican vote in that district had been two years before.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Georgia has never said nor intimated in the remotest degree that anybody, republican or democrat, was not allowed to vote in Georgia. Any intimation of that kind is utterly untrue. What the Senator from Georgia did say is printed in the RECORD and justifies no such charge as that made by the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Georgia stated that everybody was allowed to run in Georgia who chose to run, everybody was allowed to vote in Georgia who chose to vote, certainly I might add if qualified to vote. The Senator from Maine has no right to misquote my language or misinterpret my meaning.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator from Georgia, as long as he is on the floor, then, give an explanation to the Senate how it was that in districts in Georgia which only in 1876, and notably so in years before, cast a republican vote very much larger than the total vote of the district as counted in 1878? Why were not the republicans out?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No such state of things exists except in those districts where there were no opposition candidates.

Mr. BLAINE. Why was there not an opposition candidate when there were notably a great many more republican voters than the number of votes the sitting member received? That is the question.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I stated yesterday that there were no opposition candidates simply because, as far as I knew, nobody else chose to run.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator knows no reason for their not choosing to run.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator wants me to answer his insinuation that there was any means brought to bear by which anybody was prevented from running that wanted to run, by which anybody was prevented from voting that wanted to vote. I simply say his insinuations are utterly without foundation in fact, and have no support but his own statement, which is no support at all.

Mr. BLAINE. I am glad the honorable Senator yesterday stated:

It is true, astonishing as it may seem to the brilliant intellect of the Senator from Maine, that a republican is allowed to choose between democrats in Georgia—a happy condition of things.

I am reading from the Senator from Georgia.

I do not know whether that is allowed in Maine or not.

We go a good deal further in Maine. We allow a voter to choose between a republican and a democrat, and I assert that the vote in Georgia shows very clearly that in several districts that was not permitted, and witnesses can be produced by the thousands and the tens of thousands who will swear to that in any presence—no, I take that back; they will not swear to it in the presence that intimidated them from doing it. They will swear to it in any presence where to take such an oath is personally safe.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have repeated on several occasions that every statement and intimation made by the Senator from Maine that anybody was prevented from running in Georgia or that anybody was prevented from voting in Georgia was utterly untrue. I do not see what more I can say.

Mr. BLAINE. No; and I do not know that there is any need of his saying that. I only repeat that three Representatives from Georgia to-day hold their seats by having the following votes: one by 2,628, one by 3,192, and one by 3,355, and those are all the votes cast in the district. "Order reigns in Warsaw."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The statement has been made distinctly to the Senate and understood by every gentleman in the Senate excepting the Senator from Maine, that in the districts to which he alludes there was no opposition candidate.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh!

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. There was but one election at that time and that the election for member of Congress, and the people as is usual in such cases did not choose to turn out.

Mr. BLAINE. But I have repeated again and again that as late as 1876 in those very districts there were two or three times as many republican votes cast as those members who now sit in the House of Representatives representing those districts received. Here is a district that contains 30,000 votes and the honorable Senator from Georgia attempts to create the impression that there was such absolute unanimity in the choice that only 2,628 persons were needed to do the voting.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. In 1876 there were opposition candidates. In 1876 during the presidential campaign there was a republican ticket in the field, Mr. Hayes and Mr. WHEELER; there was also a democratic ticket in the field; and I suppose this brought out the votes of each party; but I presume if the Senator will examine he will find that in all the districts in 1876 the democratic vote was largely in the majority. I suppose in 1878 when there was no republican candidate in the field and the democrats were in the majority in the districts, the republicans chose of their own accord not to bring forth candidates. I suppose they have the liberty not to run candidates, if they choose not to do so.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; I believe that is a liberty that is accorded to them.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. They are permitted not to bring out a candidate; they are freely conceded the right not to vote. That is about what the admission of the Senator from Georgia amounts to.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If the Senator means that they are prohibited from bringing out a candidate, if he desires to state that, he says that which is not correct.

Mr. BLAINE. I do so say that, and I say it in the presence of the country, and I say it on the records of history; and I say that the honorable Senator from Georgia, whether he makes such a denial in senatorial phrase or whether he makes a denial which he intends to be offensive, is flying in the face of history and against the recorded facts. It is known in Georgia, it is sworn in Georgia by republicans of as good character as the honorable Senator has, that they did not dare to bring out a candidate and they were not permitted to bring out a candidate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not know who has sworn that, but I only know that if anybody has sworn it he has sworn falsely.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the honorable Senator's opinion. I choose to have another, and a great majority of the country choose to have another. The Senator is welcome to his opinion. That is mine, and I am welcome to mine. The facts are better than the opinion of either of us; and the honorable Senator cannot stand up here before the country and say that in a district where there are thirty-odd thousand voters, and where two years ago, when there was some protection extended to voters, there were more than 10,000 republican votes cast, all those 10,000 republican voters staid at home quietly in 1878 and allowed a democrat to be chosen by 2,628 votes. If the honorable Senator considers that to be a statement he wants to stand on, I am willing that he shall stand there. I am entirely willing that he shall stand there. It is that anomaly, that absurdity in the face of the country that in a district known to hold over 10,000 republican votes, in a district which within two years has cast 10,000 republican votes, all those voters would quietly stay at home in a year of great excitement throughout the country when there was a tremendous contest for the mastery of the House of Representatives, that those 10,000 people would quietly stay at home and allow 2,628 democrats to choose a Representative in Congress! It is on such facts as that that I am glad to see the honorable Senator ground and rest his defense of the case.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Georgia grounds and rests his defense on no fact stated by the Senator from Maine. He wishes that to be distinctly understood.

Mr. BLAINE. Or anybody else.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, I do not say that.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, yesterday when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] made the statement he did in regard to Rhode Island, it seemed to me that there was a great deal of force in what he said, because the facts show that the State of Rhode Island has, according to the census, a total population of 217,000; 55,000 of these are foreigners, reducing her native population to 162,000. It requires 131,500 of population to send a Representative to Congress, and, with the exception of the few foreign-born citizens that own real estate, all the foreign-born citizens of Rhode Island are disfranchised. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that:

> When the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Therefore it is obvious that if all, certainly more than half, the male citizens of foreign birth in Rhode Island are not allowed to vote, and the representation of Rhode Island is necessarily reduced to a point where she cannot legally or constitutionally have but one Representative in Congress, because she is obliged to have a fraction more than half the ratio before she can be entitled to two, with the limited quantity of real estate in Rhode Island, I suppose there are very few persons of foreign birth who are owners of real estate. Fifty-five thousand persons of foreign birth are shown by the census to be there and only one hundred and sixty-two thousand native born; therefore she is, I doubt not, limited by law to one Representative. That may or may not be true. There may be enough foreigners in Rhode Island holding real estate to entitle the State to two Representatives; but it is surely a question that ought to be fairly looked at, because if the assumption I believe to be correct is true, she has not the number of voters required to entitle her to two Representatives. That I understand to be the simple question presented to the Senate by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD.]

On that presentation of facts the Senator from Maine and other gentlemen raise questions as to the right of Kentucky to her present representation and as to the fairness and justice of the vote of Kentucky. They suggest or insinuate that we have more Representatives in the other House than we are entitled to because at certain elections held in Kentucky there were a large number of legal votes not cast and the last Congressional Directory is brought to show that in the sixth district Mr. CARLISLE received less than 6,000 votes—5,901, while Mr. Hermes, the national, 1,877 votes, there being no republican candidate running for Congress in the Covington district, making only a fraction over 7,000 votes cast in all in that great and populous district; therefore it is said or intimated that a republican cannot or dare not run, or that there is no fairness in the Kentucky elections! Mr. President, I aver that there was no man in Kentucky, white or black, who was prevented from casting his vote at any election for whoever he pleased. The poorest negro in the State is protected as fully as the chairman of the democratic State committee in the exercise of these rights. No man was ever dismissed from service, office, or other employment; no man was ever threatened there because of his vote. Congress forced us to vote by ballot for members of Congress. We used to vote viva voce. We do it now for every other office. Men walk up to the polls, call out the names of the men they vote for in the hearing of all bystanders. There is no tissue ballot, no fraud, no concealment in the great State I in part represent; no man was ever interfered with in the exercise of his political rights anywhere in the State. Will gentlemen assert that in the Covington district, represented by my friend, Mr. CARLISLE, a republican dare not run or vote as he chooses. No man dare so charge. There was a small vote cast at the last election because there was no opposition except from the nationals, and there are very few nationals in that district; the people knew that. Mr. CARLISLE could have received 20,000 votes, in my judgment, against the national candidate if he had been in any danger.

The same state of facts, I doubt not, applies to Georgia that applies to the Covington (Kentucky) district. Observe in 1876, going back to the directory for that year, William E. Arthur ran for Congress in the Covington district. He received 11,424 votes and Myers (republican) 6,564. If the argument of the Senator from Maine be true, Mr. Myers having received in that election a larger vote than Mr. CARLISLE did in the last election, why did not some republican run? Was any republican deterred from running? No. Why did he not run? Simply, sir, because Mr. Arthur had received in that same election 11,424 votes. The democratic majority in that district was known always to be from five to seven thousand legitimate majority. Nobody denied it. Everybody knew it. Therefore, although the republican had received a larger number of votes two years ago than Mr. CARLISLE received the last time—his democratic predecessor then received 6,000 more votes than his opponent did—that is the reason why there was no radical opposition and why there were not large votes in many Kentucky districts.

I was amazed to hear any suggestion as to fraud or intimidation in my State. There were only three districts in Kentucky last year where there was any contest; there was one in the third district between Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. Hunter, republican, with a national also running; and the vote in that district was 9,354 for Mr. CALDWELL, 8,502 for the republican, Mr. Hunter, and 2,339 for Mr. Wright, national; total 20,195. If there had been a race in the Covington district—for it has increased in population more largely than any other, as it includes the cities of Covington and Newport—there could have been 30,000 votes cast just as well as 6,000, and there would have been but for the fact that Mr. CARLISLE had no opposition, as his ability and popularity with his people is undoubted.

In another district, a very closely contested district, represented in the last Congress by Judge Durham, Mr. THOMPSON, the present Representative, ran, and was opposed by George Denny, a republican, THOMPSON receiving 12,538 and Denny receiving 10,766—total 23,304 votes in that district. Why was this? Simply because there was a race in that district. If Mr. Denny had not run against Mr. THOMPSON the chances are that Mr. THOMPSON would not have received over five or six thousand votes, because what is the use of men leaving their homes and going many miles, as they have to do in many Kentucky precincts, when there is no opposition to the man of their choice, when one vote is as good as 10,000 with nobody opposing? Our people do not fight when nobody opposes; and we always give each other fair notice if a contest is intended, and speak from the same stump to the men of both parties. No other course would be tolerated by the decent men of either party.

So it was in the tenth district, represented by Mr. TURNER. He received 10,784 votes and a man named Dils, who called himself an independent or a granger or a temperance man or something, received 8,392 votes, and Carter, national, received 272 votes, making 19,448 votes cast in that district. There were more votes cast in those three contested districts of Kentucky than in all the balance of the State I expect, because there were contests there and there only.

My friend, Mr. BLACKBURN, in my old district, I observe received only 8,632 votes. He could have had 25,000 if necessary. Looking over the race before the last made when Mr. BLACKBURN had some opposition from a democrat, he received 11,298; this time he has only 8,632, nobody running against him. Going a few years further back I observe that when I ran I received 14,000 and the republican received six or seven thousand. It depends always on the question what contests there are in the districts. I do not mean to offend anybody by using the word "absurd," but I say in point of logic it is absolutely absurd to contend that because when there is no opposition in a district and men are disinclined to come out without necessity or cause, therefore their States have not the votes to entitle them to their present representation, or that anybody has been prevented from voting.

I had the honor to run three times for Congress in my district without any serious opposition. I had a pretty hard race at one time—the first time the negroes voted—and we voted then up to nearly thirty thousand, as I recollect, and my majority was large. It is opposition that brings out the people. Without opposition they do not come out, even to vote for the most popular man.

Mr. BLACKBURN'S popularity in my district is greater now than when he first ran or when he ran the second time, and yet his vote at the last election was not much more than half what it was before, because he had no opposition. He could double it—yes, quadruple it—to-day if any man saw fit to oppose him. The ablest Senator in this body might locate in that district and seek to oppose him, and then he would see what a vote would come out, then it could not be limited to twenty or twenty-five thousand, and Mr. BLACKBURN would have three-fourths of them against the ablest republican in America. All this talk is, as I said, simply absurd.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to state an incident illustrative of the same idea?

Mr. BECK. I am done. I yield the floor altogether.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I simply want to state in confirmation of what the Senator from Kentucky says that the small number of votes cast for a gentleman when he has no opposition is no evidence of his popularity or unpopularity. In my State the eighth district is represented by Mr. STEPHENS. He was nominated by the democratic party in 1878. The republican congressional convention assembled in the district and passed resolutions declining to nominate a republican candidate, and expressing their entire satisfaction with Mr. STEPHENS; so that he was in truth the choice of all the parties of the district, and yet he received only 3,355 votes. He got a very small vote, only a little over 3,000 in a district where the voting population must be about 25,000, simply because everybody was content and nobody was opposing him.

Mr. BLAINE. The absurdity that the honorable Senator from Kentucky sees in this is not quite so great on examination as it might seem at first blush. I find here some facts in regard to three districts in Mississippi. The fourth district is represented by General SINGLETON. He was elected by 4,671. There was a republican vote of 4,547 cast in that district in 1876. The fifth district is represented by General HOOKER. He was elected to the present Congress by 5,513. Two years ago the republican vote in that district was 8,646. In the sixth district Mr. CHALMERS was chosen by a vote of 8,054. Two years ago the republican vote in that district was 12,386. Now, the logic of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, following that of the Senator from Georgia, is that there was such absolute and general acquiescence between 1876 and 1878 on the part of the republicans in these districts in the propriety of having them represented by democrats that there was no opposition whatever; and that is the large fact which we are expected to swallow and digest without making any wry faces at it, and to accept that as the statement and the logic of the situation.

Mr. President, this subject was not brought into the Senate by any one on this side. The honorable Senator from Indiana yesterday was the first one who alluded to it. He said:

> It may be a subject of very important inquiry to know whether our sister State of Rhode Island that casts less than 24,000 votes, with two members of Congress, is entitled under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution to that representation.

And on that he grounds an action against Rhode Island. When I point out to him that the vast majority of the districts in the South cast about the same number of votes, many of them a very small fraction of that vote, then the answer from the South is, on the part of the Senators from Georgia and Kentucky, that there is such general acquiescence in the democratic candidates that nobody thinks it worth while to come out and vote against them, and that in the two years last past there has been such a miraculous interposition of conversion from the republican to the democratic side that there is practically no opposition. Might they not give a little of that miracle to Rhode Island, and just imagine that there is a general acquiescence in Rhode Island in the republican rule there, and that they might have got out a good many more votes had it been necessary. I have not heard the honorable Senator from Rhode Island interpose that plea; but it seems to me to be quite as proper and quite as applicable in the one case as in the other.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I desire, inasmuch as the Senator from Maine made allusion to three districts in the State of North Carolina as casting an unusual and suspiciously small vote, to say that in the eighth district and in the sixth district of that State there was no opposition at all, and they were districts that had been always overwhelmingly democratic, so much so as to render it hopeless to make any opposition; and in the seventh the opposition was very feeble. But the true vote of these districts as represented in contests when parties are brought out is to be found in the year 1876. The average of the voters in the eighth congressional district of North Carolina, as shown by the election of that year, is 28,301, which I think is about equal to any district almost in the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. I have the statistics here right to hand for the honorable Senator from North Carolina. In the eighth district of that State R. B. VANCE was chosen and holds his seat by a vote of 2,894. Two years ago the republican vote in the district was 7,493.

Mr. VANCE. And the democratic vote was 15,868.

Mr. BLAINE. And all the other democrats knew somehow or other instinctively that they were not needed.

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir; because your party had not received the supplies and orders from Washington City. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Out of a democratic vote two years ago of 20,000 in the district somehow or other there happened to be an understanding all over that district that only 2,000 were necessary to come out. Now, let the honorable Senator from North Carolina explain to me how, in a district that must cover a very considerable expanse of territory, because North Carolina is not a densely populated State—will he explain to me (as a matter of curiosity I ask it) how it was so generally known on the part of the democrats, who could cast 20,000 votes, that it was only necessary to bring out 2,800; because, although the republicans had cast 8,000 votes two years ago, there were none of them coming out? How did that happen?

Mr. VANCE. I cannot state exactly what each man at home thought, except that in this instance it was generally understood that they were not needed, and more than one-third of the votes cast for the sitting member for the eighth district belonged to the gentleman's own party.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I will give him another conundrum. In the sixth district, WALTER L. STEELE holds his seat by 5,166 votes. Two years ago there were 10,283 republican votes in that district. How was it known throughout that district that the 10,283 republicans need not come out?

Mr. VANCE. That is precisely the same conundrum you put me before, and the same answer applies.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the republicans vote for Mr. STEELE also?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Then it is not the same conundrum, because the answer is not the same.

Mr. VANCE. They did not come out at all. They put out no candidate.

Mr. BLAINE. Why did they not have a candidate?

Mr. VANCE. You ought to answer that. You were in authority in republican councils in Washington City, and you know why they did not send money down to prepare for the elections and to have them contested on account of fraud if you lost. The Senator from Maine ought to know the reason for that. I am sure I do not.

Mr. BLAINE. I could give a reason, but the honorable Senator would not accept it. Then, in the seventh district R. F. ARMFIELD was elected by 8,403 votes, when two years ago the republicans cast 9,500 votes. In those three districts of North Carolina the three sitting members in the other end of the Capitol were chosen by a vote that was a fraction only of the republican vote that had been cast in the district, and therefore I leave it for the honorable Senator, not to answer to me, but to answer to the Senate and to the country how it became known to those twenty-five thousand republicans who could largely have outvoted the numbers cast for the democratic candidates that it was not worth while for them to come out? That is the question I want answered.

Mr. VANCE. If the Senator from Maine desires to know, I cannot give him the information; but as to his conundrum to the Senate and to the country, I was simply trying in accordance with precedents that have been established to put my information in where it would do the most good. I do not think there is a man in the Senate or in the United States of America who is acquainted with the run of politics but knows very well the proper answer to that question. It is that sometimes where there is no contest and where there is no hope of victory the minority party does not come out at all. In the seventh district of North Carolina that was last named by the Senator, I know the fact that in one of the republican counties of that district no election was held at all, at least none was reported to the board of canvassers. The vote was extremely small on both sides. As the proportion of falling off was about the same on one side as the other, it would still leave the majority party in a small majority. That is the explanation, which I think the country understands.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the country understands it exactly that way with a little addendum by way of illustration. They do understand that it has got to be in a great many sections of the South utterly useless and utterly valueless to make any opposition in the shape of a popular election to the democratic party, and that therefore it does not make any odds whether six hundred or one thousand or ten thousand do the voting. It is just as well in a district with twenty thousand democratic voters to have eight thousand do the voting as to have the whole of them do it; and the ten or twelve thousand republicans who are there who would be anxious to have some opportunity to elect a Representative know that it is not the slightest use in the world for them, and it is gradually coming to that that a very small handful determine who shall be the Representative and make a positive mockery of popular elections.

Mr. VANCE. I should like to ask the Senator if it is unknown in any portion of his country that a party that is in a hopeless minority fail sometimes to put up a candidate; or do they always make a fight just the same as if they were going to win a victory and poll their full strength?

Mr. BLAINE. I will answer the honorable Senator by some statistics I have here, classifying the North and the South. In the North there were one hundred and seventy-seven districts that cast over 20,000 votes. There were only two districts in the whole North that cast below 15,000, and those were the two that were referred to in my honorable friend's State. I think the figures answer the Senator.

Mr. VANCE. Were there other elections held at the same time—State elections?

Mr. BLAINE. None so important as the election of Representatives to Congress.

Mr. VANCE. But were there not State, county, or municipal elections to bring voters to the polls?

Mr. BLAINE. In some States there were, I suppose, and in some there were not.

Mr. VANCE. And in North Carolina there were no other elections, State, county, or municipal.

Mr. BLAINE. The answer to the Senator is this: that there were only two districts of the entire North that did not cast a larger vote than the aggregate in the South excepting the three large States I have named—only two. That shows a condition in the whole of them——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired; and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

CLAIMS AGAINST NICARAGUA.

Mr. CONKLING. Before that is proceeded with, I ask attention to another matter. The Chair and the Senate may remember that some time ago a select committee was appointed to take certain action touching claims of American citizens against the government of Nicaragua. I have here from the State Department certain papers which need not at this moment be specified; and in respect of these papers, to the end that the committee may proceed, I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That the communication of the Secretary of State of the 20th instant to the select committee on claims of American citizens against the government of Nicaragua, with the accompanying list of claims, be printed for the use of the committee.

The order was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OFFICERS ON THE FLOOR OF CONGRESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will announce the committee ordered yesterday on the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] upon the bill introduced by him, the bill (S. No. 227) to provide that the principal officers of each of the Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives. The committee will consist of Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. VOORHEES, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. FARLEY, Mr. CONKLING, Mr. ALLISON, Mr. BLAINE, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. PLATT.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1379) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of general taxes and assessments for special improvements now due to the District of Columbia, and for a revision of assessments for special improvements, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District;

A bill (H. R. No. 1856) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to extend the area for the taking up and impounding of domestic animals into the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1894) authorizing the employment of an inspector of plumbing in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place vessels and hulks at the disposal of commissioners of quarantine or other persons at the ports of the United States.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

VISITORS TO THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. WHYTE. At the last session of Congress the Vice-President did me the honor to appoint me one of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point. At that time I supposed it would be within my power to serve. Since then circumstances have arisen in my family which render it impossible for me to leave my home at the present time. I therefore ask to be excused from that service and that it may be done at this time so that a Senator may be appointed to take my place as the examination begins on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks to be excused from service as one of the Board of Visitors at West Point. The law vests the appointment in the Vice-President. I do not suppose it is necessary to put the question to the Senate as to whether the Senator shall be excused. He has a right to resign, I suppose. As the examination will commence next Monday, and the Vice-President is not likely to be here this week, the President pro tempore will appoint the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] in place of the Senator from Maryland, one of the Board of Visitors.

USE OF TROOPS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 621) authorizing the employment of the militia and the land and naval forces of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I move to amend the pending bill by striking out the fifth section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the per diem pay of each juror, grand or petit, in any court of the United States, shall be $2, and that the last clause of section 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which refers to the State of Pennsylvania, and sections 801, 820, and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are hereby repealed; and that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less than three hundred persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State; and no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, and all juries to serve in courts after the passage of this act shall be drawn in conformity herewith. All general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

That the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, namely, sections 2016, 2018, and 2020, and all of the succeeding sections of said statutes down to and including section 2027, and also section 5522, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that section 2017 be amended by striking out of the first line thereof as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "and required;" and that section 2019 be amended by striking out of said section in lines 11 and 12 as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots," and by striking out from line 13 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "in respect to such canvass."

That section 2028 be amended by striking out in lines 1 and 2 of said section as printed in the Revised Statutes the words "or a deputy marshal," and by striking out in line 3 of said section as printed in said statutes the words "city, town, county, parish." That all of section 2031 of said statutes, except so much thereof as relates to the pay of supervisors of elections, and that all other sections of the Revised Statutes and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of chief supervisors of elections, special deputy marshals of elections, or general deputy marshals having any duties to perform in respect to any election and prescribing their duties and powers and allowing them compensation, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WALLACE. It will be seen, sir, that the amendment offered by me is in letter the provision of that portion of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill which was known as the political section; and my purpose is to speak to that.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand the veto message of the President of the United States, dated the 29th of May, and sent to the House of Representatives this morning. In it he thus discusses the subject of "national elections:"

If this bill is approved, only the shadow of the authority of the United States at the national elections will remain—the substance will be gone. The supervision of the elections will be reduced to a mere inspection, without authority on the part of the supervisors to do any act whatever to make the election a fair one.

Again:

The passage of this bill has been urged upon the ground that the election of members of Congress is a matter which concerns the States alone; that these elections should be controlled exclusively by the States; that there are and can be no such elections as national elections; and that the existing law of the United States regulating the congressional elections is without warrant in the Constitution.

And again:

The constitutional authority to regulate the congressional elections which belongs to the Government of the United States, and which it is necessary to exert to secure the right to vote to every citizen possessing the requisite qualifications, ought to be enforced by appropriate legislation.

Here are the words "national elections." With the import given to these words I propose to take issue. With the doctrines enunciated in this veto message I propose to take direct issue, and to assert and prove if I can that there is under the Constitution of this country no such thing as "national elections."

I quote from the President's veto message of the 30th of April these words:

The States may employ both military and civil power to keep the peace and to enforce the laws at State elections. It is now proposed to deny to the United States even the necessary civil authority to protect the national elections. No sufficient reason has been given for this discrimination in favor of the State and against the national authority. If well-founded objections exist against the present national election laws, all good citizens should unite in their amendment. It is the right and duty of the National Government to enact and enforce laws which will secure free and fair congressional elections.

And in his veto message of May 12, 1879, returning without his approval "An act to prohibit military interference at elections," which bill is in these words:

Whereas the presence of troops at the polls is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and the traditions of our people, and tends to destroy the freedom of elections: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful to bring to or employ at any place where a general or special election is being held in a State any part of the Army or Navy of the United States, unless such force be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to enforce section 4, article 4, of the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, on application of the Legislature or the executive of the State where such force is to be used; and so much of all laws as is inconsistent herewith is hereby repealed—

He speaks thus:

Under the sweeping terms of the bill the National Government is effectually shut out from the exercise of the right and from the discharge of the imperative duty to use its whole executive power whenever and wherever required for the enforcement of its laws at the places and times when and where its elections are held. The employment of its organized armed forces for any such purpose would be an offense against the law unless called for by, and therefore upon permission of, the authorities of the State in which the occasion arises. What is this but the substitution of the discretion of the State governments for the discretion of the Government of the United States as to the performance of its own duties? In my judgment this is an abandonment of its obligations by the National Government; a subordination of national authority and an intrusion of State supervision over national duties which amounts, in spirit and tendency, to State supremacy.

The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] in his speech of May 9, uses these words:

There remains the undisputed and indisputable fact that by the laws, as they stood before, there was conferred upon the President of the United States in certain contingencies, and upon the marshals of the United States in other contingencies, the express authority to exert every force of which the Republic is capable under its Constitution and its laws to prevent the violent infraction of it; and as I say, there was no exception as to elections or days, or places, or occasions.

That was the state of the law in 1865, when, as I have stated, Congress did not exert the power that the Constitution by express terms grants to it to regulate the manner of the election of members of Congress; but since that time it has exerted that power and it has proposed to the people of the States, and the people have agreed to it by the constitutional majority, the amendments to the Constitution which were meant to secure the universality of equal rights and the universality of the security of equal suffrage in the respects I have named.

NATIONAL ELECTIONS—FEDERALISM REVIVED.

I quote these passages to show that there is now again asserted the power and the right of the Federal Government to control and dominate the people while they exercise the privilege of voting. "National elections," "National duties without exceptions as to days, places, or occasions," "The security of equal suffrage," are now proclaimed as vigorously as these doctrines were in 1799, when Matthew Lyon was prosecuted and a consolidated government and the abasement of the foreign-born citizen were the ends sought. The enemies of a people's government then tried to make the Federal Government the vehicle of oppression and wrong, to wrest it from its mission as a republican democracy and convert it into a consolidated aristocracy.

Mr. Otis, of Massachusetts, a federalist, in the House of Representatives, on the passage of the sedition law in June, 1798, summarized the whole issue that divides your teachings from ours when he said, "The whole question resolved itself into this inquiry, Has Congress the power to provide for the common defense and welfare of the Government? And if so, do we deem it essential to this end that the proposed power should be given to the President or to some other department of the Government?" Robert Goodloe Harper, of South Carolina, the federal leader in the House, also grasped the tenets you enforce through John I. Davenport when he said, May 2, 1798, on the passage of the law which fixed fourteen years as the period of residence before naturalization, this:

Mr. Harper believed that it was high time we should recover from the mistake which this country fell into when it first began to form its constitutions, of admitting foreigners to citizenship. This mistake, he believed, had been productive of very great evils to this country, and unless corrected he was apprehensive those evils would greatly increase. He believed the time was now come when it would be proper to declare that nothing but birth should entitle a man to citizenship in this country.

Mr. Otis said he would propose an amendment which he believed would be in order, which was as follows, namely, "and that no alien born, who is not at present a citizen of the United States, shall hereafter be capable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Mr. Harper then moved to amend by adding:

Or of voting at the election of any member of the Legislature of the United States or of any State.

THE FEDERALISTS INSISTED ON TROOPS IN 1800.

It was Michael Leib, of Pennsylvania, a German republican, a friend of Jefferson, who, on the 13th of February, 1800, introduced a resolution into the House of Representatives in these words:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill containing such legislative provisions as may be judged expedient either for removing any military force of the United States from any place of holding elections or for preventing their interference in such elections.

This resolution after amendment by the House, which was then controlled by the federalists, was referred to a committee which consisted of John Marshall, Leib, and Otis of Massachusetts, two federalists and one republican. It was reported back by Marshall, March 14, 1798, and passed the House.

I shall not read in detail that bill, but it is found now upon the files of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask if he has before him a copy of the bill as it appears in the Senate files?

Mr. WALLACE. I have.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish he would read it.

Mr. WALLACE. I will. It is:

An act to prevent the interference of any military force in certain elections.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be unlawful for any military force of the United States to appear around or embodied at the place and on the day of holding an election for electors of the President and Vice-President of the United States, or of any member of Congress, or of the governor or a member of the Legislature of any State, or in any manner to interfere with such election.

SEC. 2 And be it further enacted, That if any body of troops shall be stationed in the neighborhood of the place where such election may be held, and notice thereof be given, in writing, by any person or persons holding the same, to their commanding officer, it shall be his duty, in a special manner, to superintend their conduct on that day, so as to prevent any violation of this act, and for that purpose to detain them in camp, unless it shall be signified to him in writing by the officer or officers presiding over or conducting such election that the vicinity of such troops will incommode or may overawe the voters, and that he is requested to remove them to such convenient distance, not exceeding one mile, as in such notice may be prescribed, in which case it shall be the duty of the officer to conform to the request contained in such notice: Provided always, That it shall be lawful for such officer to leave at the proper station such guard as may be necessary for the protection of the works, military stores, and other property which may have been intrusted to his care.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any officer who shall refuse or fail to observe the regulations of this act shall be adjudged guilty of disobedience of orders and shall be cashiered. Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to deprive officers or soldiers of their right to vote as citizens, for which purpose those who are entitled to vote may be permitted to attend such elections unarmed as other persons.

The yeas and nays were not called, for the wisdom of the measure seemed plain. It went to the Senate, was debated, amended, and voted down, April 4, 1800, by the federalists, who then had a majority in the Senate, which they lost in that year when Jefferson was elected.

The yeas and nays were as follows:

For the bill—
Anderson, of Tennessee,
Baldwin, of Georgia,
Bloodworth, of North Carolina,
Brown, of Kentucky,
Cocke, of Tennessee,
Foster, of Rhode Island,
Franklin, of North Carolina,
Langdon, of New Hampshire,
Marshall, of Kentucky,
Mason, of Virginia,
Nicholas, of Virginia,
Pinckney, of South Carolina—12.
All republicans or Jefferson men.

Against the bill—
Bingham, of Pennsylvania,
Chipman, of Vermont,
Dayton, of New Jersey,
Dexter, of Massachusetts,
Goodhue, of Massachusetts,
Greene, of Rhode Island,
Gunn, of Georgia,
Hillhouse, of Connecticut,
Latimer, of Delaware,
Laurance, of New York,
Livermore, of New Hampshire,
Lloyd, of Maryland,
Paine, of Vermont,
Read, of South Carolina,
Ross, of Pennsylvania,
Tracy, of Connecticut,
Wells, of Delaware—17.
All federalists or Adams men.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to inquire of him what does he say was the political complexion of the House of Representatives at that time?

Mr. WALLACE. It was federal, and under the control of those who supported Mr. Adams, including John Marshall, who was a federalist.

Mr. CONKLING. So that the same political party which passed this bill in the House rejected it in the Senate, as I understand the facts?

Mr. WALLACE. That was the result practically. The federalists of those days were for troops at the polls, as the friends of consolidated government who call themselves republicans in these days now are. What a commentary on names it is for a party wearing the name of "republican" to contend for the employment of troops in connection with elections! It was the "federal" party under John Adams that sent United States troops riding through Pennsylvania on political errands, and it was the "republican" party under Thomas Jefferson that arrested this crime against liberty. It was "federal" troopers that cut down "liberty poles" in Pennsylvania in the year 1800, and it was Pennsylvania "republicans" that rose in wrath against this abuse of power and swept Adams out of office and the federal party out of existence. Now we see the principles and the practices of the federalists revived by men who call themselves republicans!

The General Advertiser (Aurora) of Philadelphia, under date of April 9, 1800, says of this soldier bill:

The Senate have rejected the bill passed by the House of Representatives to prevent the interference of the military in our elections. This bill was referred to a committee of which James Ross, the late candidate for governor of Pennsylvania, was one. This committee reported against passing the bill, and it was consequently rejected. Thus we see that the military are designed for domestic uses, and that instead of employment against a foreign enemy they can be so managed as to direct elections. James Ross may hope through such instrumentality on a future occasion to become governor of Pennsylvania if the foul weather should continue.

OLD ISSUES REVIVED.

How the history of eighty years ago repeats itself! The old questions are presented, the old issues revived. You preach a consolidated government. You hate and persecute the foreign-born citizen. You debase your States, prostitute your people, and invite the mailed hand of the Federal trooper to supervise the ballots of your electors. Contrast the political condition of the country now with that of the Republic then as described by Jefferson in his letter to Mazzei, thus:

The aspect of our politics has wonderfully changed since you left us. In place of that noble love of liberty and republican government which carried us triumphantly through the war, an Anglican monarchical aristocratical party has sprung up, whose avowed object is to draw over us the substance, as they have already done the forms, of the British government. The main body of our citizens, however, remain true to their republican principles, the whole landed interest is republican, and so is a great mass of talents. Against us are the executive, the judiciary, two out of three branches of the legislature, all the officers of the Government, all who want to be officers, all timid men who prefer the calm of despotism to the boisterous sea of liberty. British merchants, and Americans trading on British capital, speculators and holders in the banks and public funds, a contrivance invented for the purposes of corruption and for assimilating us in all things to the rotten as well as the sound parts of the British model.

It would give you a fever were I to name to you the apostates who have gone over to these heresies, men who were Samsons in the field and Solomons in the council, but who have had their heads shorn by the harlot England. In short, we are likely to preserve the liberty we have obtained only by unremitting labors and perils. But we shall preserve it; and our mass of weight and wealth on the good side is so great as to leave no danger that force will ever be attempted against us. We have only to awake and snap the Lilliputian cords with which they have been entangling us during the first sleep which succeeded our labors.

Contrast the doctrines then denounced by Jefferson with the condition of things to-day. Against us are the executive and the judiciary. We have the two legislative branches of the Government, but all the officers of the Government are against us, ninety thousand in number. All who want to be officers in that field are against us. All sorts of men who prefer the calm of despotism to the boisterous sea of liberty are against us. Speculators and holders in the banks and public funds, all these are against us, and these to-day are, as they were then, used as a contrivance for the purpose of corruption and for assimilating us in all things to a strong government. Sir, the history of eighty years ago repeats itself to-day.

1787, in addressing his people in the presidential contest of 1800 between Adams and Jefferson, said:

In examining the second section of the sedition law, as maintained in my last, I will remark that the friends of Mr. Adams, the present President, well knew that there was no common law—common to the United States—and such as their courts could take cognizance of; that however the strong arm of power might be lifted to establish this doctrine and break down, as had been done in other instances, the barriers of the Constitution, yet that when it came to be proved it could not stand the test of constitutional or even legal examination. To make, therefore, their favorite object sure, and prevent an inquiry into the President's administration as it progressed, and to prohibit that investigation of its measures; that appeal to the wisdom and republicanism of the people on the approaching election, from which they were afraid, Mr. Adams or the supporters of his measures had everything to dread and nothing to hope; for these reasons they determined to create a new crime and give to their courts a new jurisdiction; to take from the State courts and juries their undoubted right to decide every question of libels and to give it to courts formed by judges appointed by the President, whose administration this act is intended to screen, and what, if possible, is still more intolerable, to juries packed by marshals who have received and hold their offices at the will of the same President.

These, my countrymen, are the only objects of the sedition law. They know your State judges are impartial and independent men; that they neither fear the frown of power nor court the smile of office; that your juries are either impartially drawn by lot or selected by sheriffs elected by the people, and that they would be likely upon every occasion to discountenance any attempt to enslave the press.

It is easily to be seen that from such independent judges and impartial juries no danger was to be expected to the press, no obsequiousness to power or office, no wish to pave the way to that consolidation of all power in the Federal Government which it never can be the intent or can be the interest of the State governments or of the people to adopt or even to endure. A new power, therefore, was necessary to be given to the judges and courts of the United States to produce this important end. While the press was free no hope could be entertained of its accomplishment. The independent virtue and firmness of thousands of your citizens would oppose it with success.

Holding, as I do, the fixed and unalterable opinion that Congress have no right to legislate at all upon the subject; that they possess the same right to tell me what god I shall worship or in what manner adore him as to say under what limitations I shall be permitted to investigate the conduct of our public servants, it is with difficulty I can bring myself to condescend to examine any part of the law. It is the principle and want of power in Congress to pass it that I wish to attack in a manner that will hereafter prevent any similar attempt.

Censures or charges against a government and its measures are merely matters of opinion, on which men of opposite political sentiments never can agree. The man who is fond of royalty, and considers the British or any other monarchy as the greatest effort of the human mind, will naturally view standing armies, great power in the judges, even as in England frequently without the intervention of a jury, high taxes, a well paid and influential clergy, strong powers in the executive, and even the alien and sedition laws as proper, and indeed necessary, while a plain republican citizen will shudder at the names of royalty or standing armies, judges without juries, high taxes, or a domineering clergy and an established religion.

Packed juries, partial marshals, and distrusted judges were the agencies feared then as the outgrowth of national power, consolidated authority, and Federal pressure, while home rule, our own tribunals, honest judges, and impartial juries were the desired alternatives. The latter are the results of democratic-republican rule, the former the fruits of consolidated federalism, of a strong government, of national rule in the field that belongs to the States.

STATE RIGHTS OUR DEFENSE.

In the crusade which Mr. Hayes and the stalwarts now initiate the States and the rights of the people secured by State law and State constitutions are decried or forgotten. It is not the policy of the antagonists of the democratic party now to permit the people to remember that in all the older States the titles to our homes spring from colonial or State authority, and that our persons, our property, our lives, and our personal liberty, all find their safeguards there. The States existed before the Federal Government, and they and the people created it. Each yielded to it some of their power, and plainly and clearly defined in the Constitution what they had granted. All other powers were reserved to the States and the people.

Secession was revolution, but the rights of the States as plainly embodied in our Constitution is an entirely different matter, and these and their legitimate fruits are as vital to the whole, as necessary to our might, our perpetuity, and our expansion, as the former were destructive of the whole. The consolidation of all power in the Federal Government, the centralization of authority here at the expense of the State governments, the government of the people of Pennsylvania in their local affairs by Representatives elected in Oregon and Florida, or the regulation of suffrage for our elections by those who neither know our wants nor understand our system, is utterly subversive of the essential elements in our growth and prosperity. It is in its consequences as injurious to the Government as secession. The Federal Government is supreme within its sphere, and the State governments are equally so in their sphere.

Mr. Curtis, in his history of the Constitution, (volume 2, page 381, &c.,) thus points out the vast importance of the system that Federal aggrandizement now strikes with such venom. I ask my friend from Missouri to read for me.

Mr. COCKRELL read as follows:

In this supremacy of the National Government within its proper sphere, and in the means which were devised for giving it practical efficiency, we are to look for the chief cause that has given to our system a capacity of great territorial extension. It is a system in which a few relations of the inhabitants of distinct States are confided to the care of a central authority; while, for the purpose of securing the uniform operation of certain principles of justice and equality throughout the land, particular restraints are imposed on the power of the States. With these exceptions, the several States remain free to pursue such systems of legislation as in their own judgment will best promote the interest and welfare of their inhabitants. Such a division of the political powers of society admits of the union of far greater numbers of people and communities than could be provided for by a single representative government or by any other system than a vigorous despotism. Many of the wisest of the statesmen of that period, as we now know, entertained serious doubts whether the country embraced by the thirteen original States would not be too large for the successful operation of a republican government, having even so few objects committed to it as were proposed to be given to the Constitution of the United States. If those objects had been made to embrace all the relations of social life, it is extremely probable that the original limits of the Union would have far exceeded the capacities of a republican and representative government, even if the first difficulties arising from the differences of manners, institutions, and local laws could have been overcome.

But these very differences may be, and in fact have been, made a means of vast territorial expansion, by the aid of a principle which has been placed at the foundation of the American Union. Let a number of communities be united under a system which embraces the national relations of their inhabitants, and commits a limited number of the objects of legislation to the central organs of a national will, leaving their local and domestic concerns to separate and local authority, and the growth of such a nation may be limited only by its position on the surface of the earth. The ordinary obstacles arising from distance, and the physical features of the country, may be at once overcome for a large part of the purposes of government by this division of its authority. The wants and interests of civilized life, modified into almost endless varieties by climate, by geographical position, by national descent, by occupation, by hereditary customs, and by the accidental relations of different races, may in such a state of things be governed by legislation capable of exact adaptation to the facts with which it has to deal. In this way, separate States under the republican form may be multiplied indefinitely.

Mr. WALLACE. Judge Wilson, in the Pennsylvania convention of 1787, which ratified the Federal Constitution, used this language:

In considering and developing the nature and end of the system before us it is necessary to mention another kind of liberty, which has not yet, as far as I know, received a name. I shall distinguish it by the appellation of federal liberty. When a single government is instituted, the individuals of which it is composed surrender to it a part of their natural independence which they before enjoyed as men. When a confederate republic is instituted the communities of which it is composed surrender to it a part of their political independence which they before enjoyed as States. The principles which directed in the former case what part of the natural liberty of the man ought to be given up and what part ought to be retained will give similar directions in the latter case. The States should resign to the National Government that part, and that part only, of their political liberty which, placed in that government, will produce more good to the whole than if it had remained in the several States. While they resign this part of their political liberty they retain the free and generous exercise of all their other faculties as States, so far as it is compatible with the welfare of the general and superintending confederacy. Since States as well as citizens are represented in the Constitution before us, and form the objects on which that Constitution is proposed to operate, it was necessary to notice and define federal as well as civil liberty.

And Mr. Curtis, on page 377 of the volume before referred to, says this:

This defect was now to be supplied by giving to the national authority, not only theoretically but practically, a supremacy over the authority of each State. But this was not to be done by annihilating the State governments. The government of every State was to be preserved, and so far as its original powers were not to be transferred to the General Government its authority over its own citizens and within its own territory must, from the nature of political sovereignty, be supreme. There were, therefore, to be two supreme powers in the same country, operating upon the same individuals, and both possessed of the general attributes of sovereignty. In what way and in what sense could one of them be made paramount over the other?

It is manifest that there cannot be two supreme powers in the same community if both are to operate upon the same objects. But there is nothing in the nature of political sovereignty to prevent its powers from being distributed among different agents for different purposes. This is constantly seen under the same government, when its legislative, executive, and judicial powers are exercised through different officers; and in truth, when we come to the law-giving power alone, as soon as we separate its objects into different classes, it is obvious that there may be several enacting authorities, and yet each may be supreme over the particular subject committed to it by the fundamental arrangements of society. Supreme laws, emanating from separate authorities, may and do act on different objects without clashing, or they may act on different parts of the same object with perfect harmony. They are inconsistent when they are aimed at each other or at the same individual object. When this takes place one or the other must yield; or, in other terms, one of them ceases to be supreme on the particular occasion. It was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution of the United States to provide a paramount rule that would determine the occasions on which the authority of a State should cease to be supreme, leaving that of the United States unobstructed. Certain conditions were made necessary to the operation of this rule. The State law must conflict with some provision of the Constitution of the United States, or with a law of the United States enacted in pursuance of the constitutional authority of Congress, or with a treaty duly made by the authority of the Union. The operation of this rule constitutes the supremacy of the National Government. It was supposed that, by a careful enumeration of the objects to which the national authority was to extend, there would be no uncertainty as to the occasions on which the rule was to apply; and as all other objects were to remain exclusively subject to the authority of the States within their respective territorial limits, the operation of the rule was carefully limited to those occasions.

Judge Wilson was the only Pennsylvania Representative in the Federal convention who sat in the State convention of Pennsylvania of 1787 which ratified the Constitution, and he spoke in advocacy of the Constitution, and Mr. Curtis in later days gives us the real attitude of the States to the Federal Government, each supreme within its sphere, each essential to the system, each dependent upon the people for its continued existence, and both proceeding from and operating upon the people.

DESTROY THE STATES YOU DESTROY THE GOVERNMENT.

The States were in existence long before the Union, and the latter took its birth from their power. Without them the machinery of the Federal Government would cease to act, and without the people as voters of the States the whole system would tumble into chaos. The Federal Government has no voters, it can make none, it can constitutionally control none. It cannot add to or take from the qualifications of a voter as prescribed by the State, save in protecting him from being discriminated against on account of race. When it asserts the power to create and hold "national elections" or to regulate the conduct of the voter on election day, or to maintain equal suffrage, it tramples under foot the very basis of the Federal system and seeks to build a consolidated government from a democratic republic. This is the plain purpose of the men now in control of the Federal Government, and to this end the teachings of leading republicans now are shaped.

As was said by Judge Wilson in the Pennsylvania convention, the Federal Government "instead of placing the State governments in jeopardy is founded on their existence. On this principle its organization depends: it must stand or fall as the State governments are secured or ruined."

Let us take the Constitution and read from it. Article 5 provides, in the vital power of amendment, that which makes the law, which cements the fabric, that the States can compel Congress to act whenever two-thirds thereof unite. The words are as follows:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

The State governments are supreme by inherent power originally conceded to them by the people as to the control of local legislation and administration. The Federal Government has no part or lot in this vast mass of inherent sovereign power, and its interference therewith is utterly unwarrantable.

They are supreme, too, in many matters relating to the Union itself. They elect the members of this body. Article 1, section 3, clause 1, is in these words:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote.

Their power is exclusive and irresponsible. They should act, but it is for them to judge whether they will or not. The executive of the State issues writs of election to fill vacancies in the House of Representatives. He is responsible for his action to his State alone. I read from article 1, section 2, clause 4:

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

The States appoint the officers of the national militia and provide for their training. Article 1, section 8, clause 16, is in these words:

Congress shall have power to—

Provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

It is for the States to say whether the Federal Government shall erect forts or navy-yards within their limits. Article 1, section 8, clause 17, declares that Congress shall have power—

To exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings.

No new State can be erected out of parts of another without the consent of the original State. Article 4, section 3, is in these words:

New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

So, too, the people in their State capacity are supreme as to choosing electors of President of the United States. Article 2, section 1, provides:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

This argument may be pushed much further. Let us see. It may seem futile and unnecessary to bring to the mind of the people or the Senate the doctrines that lie at the base of the Constitution, but I shall venture somewhat upon that recently untrodden field.

The existence of the Federal Government depends upon the existence of the State governments. Without their existence in their entirety it absolutely tumbles into chaos. It cannot continue itself for an hour. There are three great parts of the Federal Government, the legislative, the executive, and the judiciary. The legislative has two branches, the House and the Senate. There can be no House of Representatives of the United States after the State governments have ended. The governments of the States must exist or the popular branch of Congress fails to exist. This is as certain as it is that there is a Constitution of the United States. Besides this there is no machinery to compel the State Legistures to act in regard to this subject-matter. It must be voluntary action, action by the State, independent action by the State Legislatures. Now, how do we prove this? By simply quoting from the Constitution of the United States the regulation as to suffrage. I read again from article 1, section 2, of the Constitution, which is in these words:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

The electors for the House of Representatives of the United States are those who are qualified electors for the Legislatures of the States. Qualified how? Qualified by whom? Qualified by the Federal Government? A qualification created in an act of Congress enforced by the marshals at the point of the bayonet? No, sir; but qualified by the States. The electors for the members of the Legislatures of the States are the electors for members of the House of Representatives, and they are to be qualified by and under the constitutions of the States. If you have no qualifications of electors for the members of the Legislatures of the States, you have under the Constitution no criterion to determine who are to be the electors for members of Congress. Where are your qualified electors then? They have vanished and gone. There can be no electors for members of the lower House if there be no electors for the State Legislatures. There is no measure or criterion of qualification except as it is found in the clause quoted, which provides that the electors for members of the United States House of Representatives are the electors of the State who are qualified by State constitutions and State laws to vote for members of the Legislature. If there be none of these, there can be none for members of the Federal House, and it logically follows that the existence of the State Legislatures is vital to the existence of that branch of the Federal Government, for in their absence you have no criterion, no qualification under the Constitution itself. Do we presume to exercise that power here? Do we assert that we can grasp that power and regulate by Federal statutes the qualifications of voters? If we do, we make a consolidated government from a democratic republic.

The members of the Senate of the United States are chosen by the Legislatures of the States. Article 1, section 3, provides:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof.

If there is no Legislature there are no Senators. If there are no State electors qualified by State constitutions or State laws there are no State Legislatures. Thus it all depends finally on the State qualifications of electors. Thus we have both the Federal House of Representatives and the Federal Senate dependent upon the qualifications of electors by the States; qualifications created by State constitutions and State laws. The States themselves in their constitutions fix the qualifications of voters. They are thus an element, an indispensable element, in the constitution and perpetuity of the Federal Government. So, too, the States themselves are an element in the existence of the Federal Government, and "no State, without its consent," as is provided in article 5 of the Constitution, "shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." Here is equal suffrage for the States in this body. Thus we find the electors of the State fill the House of Representatives, and the States through the Legislatures of the States fill the Senate of the United States, all power proceeding originally from the electors of the States, qualified by State constitutions and State laws. These form the very basis of the organization of this body and of the Federal House of Representatives. Without them the Government of the United States utterly and absolutely fails. Under the Constitution of the United States you must return for ultimate power to the qualifications of electors in the States, to electors created by the States, with qualifications regulated and controlled by the States, or else these bodies cease to exist.

The Constitution, in article 2, section 1, clause 2, provides:

Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

These electors choose the President and Vice-President of the United States. If there be no State Legislatures there can be no presidential electors. The electors of the State Legislatures are created and qualified by and under State constitutions and State laws. The voters or electors in the States are the same men who choose the members of State Legislatures, and if you have no State Legislature, then inevitably the power to create electors of the President of the United States must fail. Thus you have the Senate and the House and the executive department all absolutely failing and breaking down for want of the State governments. But this is not all. The judiciary department of this Government stands upon the existence of the executive and the Senate. If the Senate fails through the want of voters to create members of the State Legislatures, and if the executive authority fails for want of the power to create and qualify voters, then we have neither Executive nor Senate to create judges of the United States. Thus we have every branch of the Federal Government, House, Senate, the executive and judiciary departments, standing upon the State governments, and all resting finally upon the people of the States, qualified as voters by State constitutions and State laws. We now see that the State governments are vital to the existence of every branch of the Federal Government, and that the voters of the States are essential to the vitality of every branch of the Federal Government. They cannot be interfered with by Federal power. The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided that suffrage is under State control, and so far as it can be settled it is judicially settled. In Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wallace, 170, the court says this:

The Constitution does not define the privileges and immunities of citizens. For that definition we must look elsewhere. In this case we need not determine what they are, but only whether suffrage is necessarily one of them.

It certainly is nowhere made so in express terms. The United States has no voters in the States of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected directly or indirectly by State voters. The members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the States, and the electors in each State must have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. Senators are to be chosen by the Legislatures of the States, and necessarily the members of the Legislature required to make the choice are elected by the voters of the State. Each State must appoint in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct the electors to elect the President and Vice-President. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives are to be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators. It is not necessary to inquire whether this power of supervision thus given to Congress is sufficient to authorize any interference with the State laws prescribing the qualifications of voters, for no such interference has ever been attempted. The power of the State in this particular is certainly supreme until Congress acts.

The amendment did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. It simply furnished an additional guarantee for the protection of such as he already had. No new voters were necessarily made by it. Indirectly it may have had that effect, because it may have increased the number of citizens entitled to suffrage under the constitution and laws of the States, but it operates for this purpose, if at all, through the States and the State laws, and not directly upon the citizen.

In The United States vs. Cruikshank, 2 Otto, 555, the Supreme Court reaffirm the doctrine in these words:

In Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178, we decided that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States. In The United States vs. Reese et al., supra, page 214, we hold that the fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is, exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship; but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, &c., is. The right to vote in the States comes from the States; but the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. The first has not been granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States, but the last has been.

The same authority declares the line of distinction between the Federal and State governments in these words:

The Government of the United States is one of delegated powers alone. Its authority is defined and limited by the Constitution. All powers not granted to it by that instrument are reserved to the States or the people. No rights can be acquired under the Constitution or laws of the United States except such as the Government of the United States has the authority to grant or secure. All that cannot be so granted or secured are left under the protection of the States.

* * * * * * *

The first amendment to the Constitution prohibits Congress from abridging "the right of the people to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." This, like the other amendments proposed and adopted at the same time, was not intended to limit the powers of the State governments in respect to their own citizens, but to operate upon the National Government alone. Barron vs. The City of Baltimore, 7 Pet., 250; Lessee of Livingston vs. Moore, id., 551; Fox vs. Ohio, 5 How., 434; Smith vs. Maryland, 18 id., 76; Withers vs. Buckley, 20 id., 90; Pervear vs. The Commonwealth, 5 Wall., 479; Twitchell vs. The Commonwealth, 7 id., 321; Edwards vs. Elliott, 21 id., 557. It is now too late to question the correctness of this construction. As was said by the late chief-justice, in Twitchell vs. The Commonwealth, 7 Wall., 325, "the scope and application of these amendments are no longer subjects of discussion here." They left the authority of the States just where they found it, and added nothing to the already existing powers of the United States.

The particular amendment now under consideration assumes the existence of the right of the people to assemble for lawful purposes, and protects it against encroachment by Congress. The right is not created by the amendment; neither was its continuance guaranteed, except as against congressional interference. For their protection in its enjoyment, therefore, the people must look to the States. The power for that purpose was originally placed there, and it has never been surrendered to the United States.

The rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man. "To secure these rights," says the Declaration of Independence, "governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The very highest duty of the States, when they entered into the Union under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of these "inalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty, for this purpose, rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty or within the power of the United States to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State, than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself.

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guarantee against any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. As was said by Mr. Justice Johnson, in Bank of Columbia vs. Okely, 4 Wheat., 244, it secures "the individual from the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private rights and distributed justice." These counts in the indictment do not call for the exercise of any of the powers conferred by this provision in the amendment.

* * * * * * * *

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States; and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guarantee.

THERE ARE NO NATIONAL VOTERS.

It is thus settled upon principle and by authority, as well as from the history of our institutions, that the voters under our systems are the people qualified by State laws and constitutions, and that the Federal Government has no voters of its own creation. Suffrage is under State control except in the single case of race, upon which subject the States can make no rule of discrimination. If there be such a thing, then, as a "national election," it wants the first element of an election—a national voter. The Federal Government, or (if it suits our friends on the other side better,) the nation, has no voters; it cannot create them, it cannot qualify them. The depositary of absolute sovereignty and power is in the people, the people of the States, qualified as electors by State constitutions and State laws; and all authority of every kind comes from them by representation, and this vital principle of democracy permeates every part of the Government.

National power over the voter as such, or national elections as such, are new forms of old federal theories. In the laws we propose to repeal, and in kindred enactments in 1870 and 1871, the revamped doctrines of the federalism of 1798 first finds statutory existence. The universal practice of the Government since 1801 has been against any such theory as is found in these statutes. National electors would require national citizenship for qualification. How absurd a theory, that a man may be a citizen of the State and not of the United States and yet be a national voter. Yet I propose to show that such would be the legitimate result of this teaching as to national elections. This subject is rightly and absolutely controlled by State law and State constitutions in almost every State. There are no national voters. Voters who vote for national Representatives are qualified by State constitutions and State laws, and national citizenship is not required of a voter of the State by any provision of the Federal Constitution nor in practice. Under the constitutions of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado an unnaturalized foreigner who has declared his intention to become a citizen may vote for members of Congress and State officers if he has resided six months in the State, and in Indiana, Minnesota, Oregon, and Wisconsin after a residence of twelve months, while in Massachusetts he must have resided in the State two years after he has been naturalized. Does the new gospel as to control of elections by national authority contemplate making the rule of seven years' residence, required by Massachusetts, or that of six months, required by Kansas, the test of qualification as a "national" voter for a foreign-born citizen? Which is the doctrine? Is it that of Massachusetts or that of Kansas? The foreign-born citizen declaring his intention, after six months' residence in Kansas, is a voter, and may vote for a member of Congress and governor of the State, while in Massachusetts he must carry a parchment certifying that he is a citizen of the United States and must have resided two years in Massachusetts. The whole difference is the difference between seven years in one State and six months in another as applied to foreign-born citizens.

National elections, naturally, necessarily, include national voters, and the plain purpose indicated by this action of the Executive is to make the States conform to Federal authority as to the rule of suffrage. I ask Senators who now have in their States masses of unnaturalized citizens who are voting for members of Congress, whether they seek to disfranchise these voters or whether it is reasonable to hold that the Federal Government can by its laws change the qualifications created and fixed by State constitutions? If Davenport could reject five thousand citizens in New York because of his allegation of non-naturalization, why shall the twenty-five thousand in the Western States who vote without naturalization be permitted to do so? Only because the whole subject is under State control. It is not hard to understand the meaning of the declaration of the Senator from Vermont for "the universality of equal suffrage," if it be read in the light of 1799 and the tenets of federalism. It means a universal rule of citizenship for suffrage everywhere. The States are to be made to bend their will to the control of universal equal suffrage by the Federal Government, and the control claimed by Kansas, Colorado, and Nebraska over the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters is to give place to a statute enacted by the Federal Government, prescribing a rule like that of Massachusetts. What more potent argument as to the fallacy of the existence of national elections can there be than the fact that qualifications for voters differ in every State, and that by universal rule the States have absolute control of the subject?

The laws of the United States require a residence of five years within the country before a foreigner can be naturalized. This makes him a citizen of the United States, but he may be a voter for members of Congress, or for electors for President, or for the members of a State Legislature who elect a United States Senator, after he has resided six months in the country if he lives in Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, or Georgia, or with twelve months' residence in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Indiana, Minnesota, Missouri, Oregon, Texas, and Wisconsin.

A naturalized foreigner can vote in California after a residence of six months; Connecticut, after a residence of one year and able to read any article of the constitution or any section of the statutes of the State; Delaware, after one year's residence and having paid taxes; Illinois, after one year's residence; Iowa, six months' residence; Kentucky, two years' residence; Louisiana, one year's residence; Maine, three months; Maryland, one year; Michigan, three months; Mississippi, six months' residence; Nevada, six months; New Hampshire and New Jersey, one year; North Carolina, one year; Ohio, one year; South Carolina, one year; Tennessee, one year; Vermont and Virginia, one year; and West Virginia, one year in the State. The same residence is required in those twenty-one States of the native-born citizens.

In these States residence is superadded by State authority as a qualification to voting for all officers, State as well as Federal. In Massachusetts two years, in Pennsylvania thirty days, and in New York ten days are added by State authority to the qualification of five years; and in Rhode Island ownership of real estate must be in the naturalized foreigner before he is a voter.

Are all these distinctions, are all the restrictions imposed by State authority and State constitutions as to residence, naturalization, qualification, registration, age, tax, and property to be obliterated in this effort for the "universality of the security of equal suffrage" in this renewed and earnest effort for a consolidated government?

The late Senator from Indiana, Mr. Morton, did not agree with the view of national duty now proposed by the President and the stalwarts. In the debate in the Senate January 23, 1876, upon the effort to amend the enforcement statutes which had been so frightfully emasculated by the Supreme Court of the United States in their opinions in United States vs. Reese, and United States vs. Cruikshank, in 2 Otto, he said:

So far as the congressional election is concerned, we have agreed in the Constitution to leave the question as to who may vote for member of Congress to the States, by providing that every person who may vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature may vote for a Representative in Congress. We have no power over that. The fifteenth amendment, however, guarantees that the colored man shall have the full right that anybody else has; that is, he shall not be prevented from voting on account of his race or color. So far as the election of President is concerned, that is a matter that belongs absolutely to the States. They may choose the electors by the Legislature, they may authorize the supreme court to appoint them, or they may provide for their being elected by the people. They may provide for a different class of voters for presidential electors from those who are entitled to vote for members of Congress. As the Constitution stands now, the States can provide just as they please in that regard. The State of Iowa to-morrow, by her Legislature, notwithstanding the law she has upon her statute-book for electing her electors by the people, may, in defiance of that law, choose the electors who shall vote for President and Vice-President. There is no power under the Constitution to prevent it. So I think that, so far as that is concerned, it does not meet the point.

The great object of this law and of all laws to enforce the amendments is to put the colored man on the precise level in regard to rights with the white man. When we have done that, we have accomplished our purpose. If we do less we come short of our duty. If we undertake to do more we are likely to endanger all. Now, the Constitution does not say anything about registration; it does not say anything about paying poll tax and a condition to vote; it does not say anything about any condition or any qualification to vote in the States. All that is left to the States, with this single prohibition, that there shall be no distinction on account of race or color, that the colored man shall have the right to vote upon like terms and conditions with the white man.

First Story on the Constitution, page 568, section 820, says:

If, then, there is no peculiar fitness in delegating such a power to the State Legislatures, if it might be hazardous and inconvenient, let us see whether there are any solid dangers from confiding the superintending and ultimate power over elections to the National Government. There is no pretense to say that the power in the National Government can be used so as to exclude any State from its share in the representation in Congress. Nor can it be said with correctness that Congress can in any way alter the rights or qualifications of voters.

The fifty-first number of the Federalist also contains the following:

The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. It was incumbent on the convention, therefore, to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the occasional regulation of the Congress would have been improper for the reason just mentioned. To have submitted it to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper for the same reason, and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone. To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the convention. The provision made by the convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments; and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such a manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution.

I assume it, then, to be the law of the land that "the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the States; and that the voters of the United States are the people of the States qualified by State constitutions and laws."

FEDERAL INTERFERENCE WITH STATE DUTY.

We now turn to the sections this bill proposes to repeal and try to learn from them whether the Federal Government leaves the question of suffrage with the States, where it belongs, or imposes qualifications, judges who shall vote, violates its own organic law, and tramples upon the constitutions of twenty States that are sovereign in this regard.

Section 2016, which is proposed to be repealed, provides:

The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

I hold in my hand the instructions of the United States marshal of New York upon this subject to his special deputies, in which he expressly authorizes and directs the deputy marshals to arrest people without warrant who may undertake to register contrary to the order of the United States supervisor. This power claimed by the Federal Government under these laws goes to registration, a registration provided not by Federal law, not under the laws or Constitution of the United States, but a registration provided for by State law. The power of the Government is sent to the place of registration and gives to the marshals of the United States, supplemented by troops to carry out the power thus given, authority to challenge men at the registry, the power to judge who shall or who shall not be registered. The power to judge includes the power to reject. The power to reject is thus absolutely given and may be enforced with every means. When you say a man shall not be registered, and the State requires registration as a prerequisite to voting, it is judging that the qualification imposed by the State does not exist. The Federal Government in doing this keeps its marshals, equipped with its mail-clad arm, at the place of registration, and rejects the voter qualified by the State just as Davenport or the marshal may determine.

Section 2018 of the Revised Statutes provides that the supervisors of elections may personally scrutinize, count, and canvass ballots. The secret ballot used by Pennsylvania and by many other States of the Republic is thrown open to public gaze by the power of the Federal supervisors. The ballot that is provided by our law is interfered with by the Federal power and State authority is utterly overthrown. "Personally scrutinize the count and canvass." What is the power to count and canvass? It is the power to judge, it is the power to determine whether a ballot has been properly and legally cast. To determine under what law? The Federal power may determine under State law. In other words, the power that the State of Iowa or the State of Pennsylvania gives to its election officers shall be interfered with by Federal officers, the secret ballot may be interfered with and broken down and the vote rejected by the marshals and supervisors if they in their judgment believe it not a proper vote, and thus they may and do add to the qualifications fixed by the constitution and laws of the State their own judgment. This is an interference plainly and clearly with the rights of the State and with the regulations and qualifications provided by the State.

Section 2020 gives to the marshals and supervisors almost unlimited control over and in regard to registration and election.

Section 2021 provides thus:

Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times or places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

Marshals are sent there under control of the Federal Government. Section 2022 gives marshals power to keep peace and to preserve order. It is as follows:

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

Here is power to keep peace at State elections. All persons may be arrested to preserve order, keep the peace, prevent registration, prevent voting, regulate the conduct of the election officers. The marshals are made the judges. They may arrest without process. They judge who is to be arrested. They judge who is committing a breach of the peace. They judge who is to vote in utter defiance of the qualifications of the voters which are fixed by the States who alone can do this. This provision violates the provisions of the bills of rights of twenty States. Not this alone, but the marshals may appoint deputies. They may delegate the power given to them to other persons.

SEC. 2023. Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

Suffrage is under State law, but here it is altogether subject to Federal power. Here the United States judges are to judge of the violation of State laws.

SEC. 2024. The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrests, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district.

Force is given to enforce the violation of duty of the State, and under the law, as held by the executive, Federal troops must aid and sustain them.

Section 5522 is highly penal in its character. The State officer or the election is subordinated to Federal authority. He may be arrested without process; nay, the Federal officers judge of the qualifications of the voters; everything that relates to the qualifications of the voters of the State is within the control of the Federal authority.

THE POWER TO JUDGE AND ARREST—STATE NOT FEDERAL.

If the power of determining who shall be registered by State officials as voters, who shall or shall not be arrested for voting or attempting to vote, who does or does not vote fraudulently, be not given by these sections to Federal officials, language cannot give those powers. The registration of a voter is the judgment of the law in favor of his qualification for the exercise of the right. The State alone can judge, for her laws have exclusive control over qualifications. If the Federal Government can judge of qualifications she can create them, and we have seen she has no such power. The power to arrest the voter for voting improperly is the power of determining his qualifications to vote. The Federal Government cannot do this, for the control of suffrage is in the States, and the act of the Federal Government in doing so is usurpation of ungranted power. The power of arresting voters and officials without warrant or with warrant, is the power to dictate the absolute control of the elections of the States, and as it can only operate upon voters and officials qualified by the States is without authority in the Constitution.

THE CLAIM OF POWER.

The authority for the exercise of this usurped power is claimed to exist in clause 1, section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which is in these words:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It is to be remembered at the outset that this provision is in a constitution that gives the control of suffrage and of the qualifications of electors for members of Congress and of Senators to the States. With this in view I read from the report of Mr. Douglas, from the Committee of Elections, in the House of Representatives, January 22, 1844:

It will be observed that the two clauses of this section differ materially in the tone in which they address the different governments. The one is commanded and the other is permitted to act. The State Legislatures shall prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding the elections; Congress may make or alter such regulations. An imperative duty rests upon the Legislature, while a mere privilege is granted to Congress. In the performance of this duty, the Legislatures are clothed with a wide discretion, upon which the Constitution imposes no restraints. They may provide for elections by general ticket, or in districts; for voting by ballot or viva voce; for opening the polls at one place and on one day, or at different places and on different days. These, and all things pertaining to the times, places, and manner of holding elections, are confided to the wisdom and discretion of the several Legislatures, to be performed in such manner as they shall deem most favorable to popular rights and just representation. The privilege allowed Congress of altering State regulations, or of making new ones, if not in terms, is certainly in spirit and design dependent and contingent. If the Legislatures of the States fail or refuse to act in the premises, or act in such a manner as will be subversive of the rights of the people and the principles of the Constitution, then this conservative power interposes, and, upon the principle of self-preservation, authorizes Congress to do that which the State Legislatures ought to have done.

The history of the Constitution, and especially the section in question, shows conclusively that these were the considerations which induced the adoption of that provision.

When General Pinckney proposed in the convention which formed the Constitution that the Representatives "should be elected in such manner as the Legislatures of each State should direct," he urged, among other reasons in support of his plan, "that this liberty would give more satisfaction, as the Legislature could then accommodate the mode to the convenience and opinions of the people."

After the substance of this provision had been fully and ably discussed, maturely considered, and unanimously adopted, the latter clause of the section conferring upon Congress the power to make regulations, or to alter those prescribed by the States, was agreed to, with an explanation at the time that "this was meant to give to the National Legislature a power not only to alter the provisions of the States, but to make regulations in case the States should fail or refuse altogether."

In vindicating this provision, while urging upon the people of the United States the ratification of the Constitution, General Hamilton, in one of the numbers of the Federalist, placed its defense upon the same principle: "Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." Notwithstanding the imperative provision that the States shall prescribe the laws of election, and the mere permissive clause that Congress may make or alter them, and the construction placed upon this section at the time by its authors, limiting and restricting its exercise to the principle of self-preservation, yet this very clause created a more violent and formidable opposition to the adoption of the Constitution than all other portions of that instrument, and greatly hazarded its final ratification by the requisite number of States.

The conventions of the States of Virginia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, and South Carolina accompanied their ratifications with a solemn protest against the power of Congress over the elections. They proposed amendments to the Constitution, changing the obnoxious provision, and recorded on their journals perpetual instructions to their representatives in Congress to urge earnestly and zealously the adoption of those amendments, and to refrain from the exercise of any power inconsistent with the principles of the proposed amendments. The amendment and instructions of the people of Virginia relating to this subject are as follows:

"The Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, or either of them, except when the Legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled by invasion or rebellion to prescribe the same; and the convention do, in the name and behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their representatives in Congress to exert all their influence, and use all reasonable and legal methods, to obtain a ratification of the foregoing alterations and provisions in the manner provided by the fifth article of the said Constitution; and in all congressional laws to be passed in the mean time to conform to the spirit of these amendments as far as the said Constitution will admit."

Massachusetts, in her convention to consider the Constitution of the United States, submitted to her for that purpose, ratified it February 7, 1788, and in the ordinance of ratification used this language:

And as it is the opinion of this convention that certain amendments and alterations on the said Constitution would remove the fears and quiet the apprehensions of many of the good people of this Commonwealth and more effectually guard against an undue administration of the Federal Government, the convention do therefore recommend that the following alterations and provisions be introduced into the said Constitution:

I. That it be explicitly declared that all powers not expressly delegated by the aforesaid Constitution are reserved to the several States to be by them exercised.

III. That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article but in all cases where a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress agreeably to the Constitution.

South Carolina, in her convention for the same purpose, uses this language:

And whereas it is essential to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States and the freedom of the people under the operations of a general government that the right of prescribing the manner, time, and places of holding the elections to the Federal Legislature should be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States, this convention doth declare that the same ought to remain, to all posterity, a perpetual and fundamental right in the local, exclusive of the interference of the general, government, except in cases where the Legislatures of the States shall refuse or neglect to perform and fulfill the same, according to the tenor of the said Constitution.

New Hampshire uses the following language:

And it is the opinion of this convention that certain amendments and alterations in the said Constitution would remove the fears and quiet the apprehensions of many of the good people of this State and more effectually guard against an undue administration of the Federal Government. The convention do therefore recommend that the following alterations and provisions be introduced in the said convention:

"That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article but in cases where a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress; nor shall Congress in any case make regulations contrary to a free and equal representation."

New York in her ratification uses this language:

Under these impressions, and declaring that the rights aforesaid cannot be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said Constitution, and in confidence that the amendments which shall have been proposed to the said Constitution will receive an early and mature consideration, we the said delegates, in the name and in the behalf of the people of the State of New York, do by these presents assent to and ratify the said Constitution. In full confidence, nevertheless, that until a convention shall be called and convened for proposing amendments to the said Constitution, the militia of this State will not be continued in service out of this State for a longer time than six weeks, without the consent of the Legislature thereof; that the Congress will not make or alter any regulation in this State, respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, unless the Legislature of this State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same; and that in those cases such power will only be exercised until the Legislature of this State shall make provisions in the premises.

And the convention do, in the name and behalf of the people of the State of New York, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress to exert all their influence and use all reasonable means to obtain a ratification of the following amendments to the said Constitution in the manner prescribed therein, and in all laws to be passed by the Congress in the mean time to conform to the spirit of the said amendments, as far as the Constitution will admit:

"That the Congress shall not make or alter any regulation in any State respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, unless the Legislature of such State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same, and then only until the Legislature of such State shall make provision in the premises: Provided, That Congress may prescribe the time for the election of Representatives."

Rhode Island uses this language:

In full confidence, nevertheless, that until the amendments hereafter proposed and undermentioned shall be agreed to and ratified, pursuant to the aforesaid fifth article, the militia of this State will not be continued in service out of this State for a longer term than six weeks without the consent of the Legislature thereof; that the Congress will not make or alter any regulation in this State respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators or Representatives unless the Legislature of this State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same; and that in those cases such power will only be exercised until the Legislature of this State shall make provisions in the premises.

The State of North Carolina refused to ratify the Constitution unless certain amendments proposed by her convention should be adopted; one of which was as follows:

That Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Senators or Representatives, or either of them, except when the Legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled by invasion or rebellion, to prescribe the same.

Thus we find that seven of the thirteen States then composing the Union, being the majority of the whole number, solemnly protested against the authority of Congress to establish regulations concerning the mode of election, or to alter those prescribed by the States; and that the Constitution was adopted with the understanding (and probably never would have been adopted but for the understanding) that it was never to be exerted except in the few specified cases.

From this brief review of the history and contemporaneous exposition of this portion of the Constitution, it is evident that the convention which formed and the people who ratified that great charter of our liberties intended that the regulation of the times, places, and manner of holding the elections should be left exclusively to the Legislatures of the several States, subject to the condition only that Congress might alter the State regulations, or make new ones, in the event that the States should refuse to act in the premises or should legislate in such a manner as would subvert the rights of the people to a free and fair representation.

The power of Congress on this subject is only supervisory. I read now from Story's Constitution, volume 1, section 815:

The objection was not to that part of the clause which vests in the State Legislatures the power of prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections, for so far it was a surrender of power to the State governments. But it was to the superintending power of Congress to make or alter such regulations. It was said that such a superintending power would be dangerous to the liberties of the people, and to a just exercise of their privileges in elections.

Also, section 816 of the same volume, quoting the Federalist:

A discretionary power over elections must be vested somewhere. There seemed but three ways in which it could be reasonably organized. It might be lodged either wholly in the National Legislatures, or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter, and ultimately in the former. The last was the mode adopted by the convention. The regulation of elections is submitted, in the first instance, to the local governments, which, in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may both conveniently and satisfactorily be by them exercised. But in extraordinary circumstances the power is reserved to the National Government, so that it may not be abused, and thus hazard the safety and permanence of the Union.

POWER TO FIX MANNER GIVES NO POWER TO REJECT VOTES.

These authorities abundantly prove that there was no intention at the time of the adoption of the Constitution to do aught else by the insertion of this provision than to assert the right of self-preservation in the Federal Government. That the regulation of the manner, places, and times of holding congressional elections was controlled by the States almost exclusively until since the war adds force to the argument. But even if we admit (which we do not) that Congress may exclude the States entirely by its own action as to fixing the times and places and regulating the manner of holding elections for members of Congress, still, in attempting to regulate the manner of election, it cannot change the qualifications of the voters.

This is an entirely different proposition. The manner of holding the elections has nothing to do with the regulation of the qualifications of voters. That still remains with the States. These qualifications are regulated, as I have already shown, by State constitutions and State laws; and the Federal Government, in every branch of it, from the House to the judiciary, depends upon the criterion found in the Constitution itself; that the voters for members of the State Legislatures are the strata upon which the Federal Government finds its authority. The qualifications of electors vests with the State governments. State constitutions and State laws regulate and control this subject from the bottom to the top. A power to regulate the manner of voting given by one clause surely never was intended to authorize the party doing so to take from another tribunal the right to fix the qualifications of the voter which had in express terms been granted to that other tribunal by other clauses of the same instrument. Such a result would be absurd. Such a legal result no lawyer will contend for. If Congress may, under the power to regulate the manner of election, say who shall register and who shall be arrested for false registry and who shall vote and who shall be arrested for false voting, and assert its right so to say by arbitrary arrests, it is plain that the exercise of regulating the manner of voting takes from the State and its officials every particle of control over the qualifications of voters.

The power asserted by these statutes and by these veto messages broadly is, that the Federal Government is a consolidated government, it can regulate the qualifications of voters, it has the right to judge who shall vote and it will assert this right and power through United States marshals and Federal troops. The power granted by the fourth section of article 1 is to regulate the manner of holding the elections, not to regulate the qualification of voters. The jurisdiction over the question of voters is vested elsewhere, and any exercise of power to affect them is unwarranted. Manner means method, way—the way in which his vote shall be given. The method of voting, whether viva voce or by ballot, and not the right to say who shall vote, is the plain meaning of the word manner, as used in this clause. By this interpretation both clauses of the Constitution stand, by that interpretation which gives validity to these statutes this clause overrides three others and destroys them.

The fifty-ninth number of the Federalist condenses the whole subject thus:

But this forms no part of the power to be conferred upon the National Govern, ment. Its authority would be expressly restricted to the regulation of the times, the places, and the manner of elections. The qualifications of the persons who may choose, or be chosen, as has been remarked upon other occasions, are defined and fixed in the Constitution, and are unalterable by the Legislature.

Thus I have shown as briefly as I may that this power is in the States and not in the Federal Government.

ORIGIN OF THESE LAWS.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] made a valuable contribution to political history in his speech of last week by proving that these infamous enactments found their origin in the New York Union League Club, and that their purpose was to control the cities of the North.

In regard to the passage of these laws, Mr. Samuel J. Glassy swears, page 185, part 2, report No. 800, first session Forty-fourth Congress:

By Mr. COCHRANE:

Question. State what you know, without going too much into detail.
Answer. Two acts of Congress, passed during the session of 1870, one in May and the other in July, were the result of a comparison of some eight or ten bills which the different members of the two different Houses had prepared and introduced on their own motion with the bills drafted to accomplish the same object. Mr. Davenport, in this same employment, acting under the directions of the club committee, and especially of myself and General Foster, was sent to Washington, his expenses being paid and he receiving compensation for his services, to attend to the urging of these bills. In the winter of 1870 and 1871 the club resolved that some further legislation was necessary on the subject, and in December of 1870 or January of 1871 Mr. Davenport went to Washington again, and while he was there this act of February 28, 1871, was passed. The concoction of that bill I had very little to do with. Some part of it was drafted by Mr. Davenport. I very distinctly remember reading over the section relating to fees. The two previous acts of Congress, those passed in May, 1870, and July, 1870, I knew all about.

Q. What did he say to you about that section in reference to fees?

A. That if he could get that clause in it would enable him to make $15,000 or $20,000 at the time of every general election. It is proper to say that these first two bills that were passed in 1870 were very carefully considered, not only by General Foster and myself, but by several prominent lawyers who were members of the club, and several members of Congress and other persons of eminence.

They do not seriously affect the people of the South; their objective points are the cities of the North. They are to be dominated and overridden by Federal power under this machinery in 1880, and New York and Cincinnati are the two focal points. Marshals are to be used as they were in 1878 in Philadelphia to enforce State restrictions and to compel the voter to obey State law as interpreted by Federal power. All of our own safeguards are to bow to unconstitutional power in the hands of disreputable marshals of the United States. A contrast of the number of southern cities of over twenty thousand inhabitants with the number of cities of that class in the North shows plainly the purpose of the law. The following table gives all of the cities in which marshals may be used:

Sixty-four cities of the North, with a total population of 7,547,795, and but ten cities of the South, with a total population of 539,500, are subject to "the universality of equal suffrage" as administered in "the national elections" through marshals, supervisors, and Federal troops.

BILLS OF RIGHTS BROKEN DOWN.

Sixty-four cities in nineteen northern States are to have the guarantees of the bills of rights and constitutions of their respective States violated and overthrown by military interference with the freedom of elections on the call of marshals of the United States; to have their electors and election officials arrested on election day in violation of their guarantee that no one shall be arrested on election day except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace. The power given to these marshals is to arrest, both with and without warrant, on election day, those whom they see fit; not this alone, but they may take the judge of election duly chosen and sworn from his place on election day, and thus dictate who shall conduct the election. This was in fact done by a deputy marshal in Philadelphia, in November, 1878, and yet there is a provision in the constitution or bill of rights of each of the following-named States which is in these or similar words:

Electors shall in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace be privileged from arrest during their attendance on elections and going to and returning therefrom.

This is found in the constitutions of California, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Connecticut.

NUMBER AND COST OF MARSHALS.

The number of these marshals and supervisors used in the past two elections may be some guide to the use intended to be made of them in the future, and I have here a table showing the number employed, where they were employed, and what we can learn they cost the people.

The tables contain only the figures of expenditure that have been reported to Congress in the various documents submitted from the Attorney-General's and Treasury Departments. There are undoubtedly districts in which money was paid for deputy marshals that have not been included in the exhibits. For instance, in the several official exhibits no expenditure for deputies is charged against Arkansas; but the marshal of the eastern district of that State, in his report embracing the congressional election of 1876, claimed allowance for seven hundred and eighty-five deputies employed one day, namely, November 7. The marshal of Florida for the same year reported that he employed seven hundred and forty-five deputies from the latter part of October until the 15th of November, but not a dollar is put down as having been expended for that State. In making out these reports of expenditures the Departments seem to have adopted the rule of reporting only districts from which the accounts had been adjusted, and this would in each case omit a portion of the expenditure. In the table for 1878 the chief supervisor's expenditures for New York city are omitted for the reason that the amount has not been reported to Congress. That, as all the figures show, is the district in which the amount has always been greatest:

There is nothing on record throwing any light upon expenditures of this character prior to 1876 except the report of the Caulfield committee of the Forty-fourth Congress. That committee compiled a statement of expenditures from John I. Davenport, chief supervisor in New York, for the election of November 5, 1872, in that city. It was shown that the amount expended in New York City alone under the Federal election laws for that election was nearly $120,000, and this, very probably, is a fair illustration of the manner in which the public money was used all over the country. A summary of the expenditures was as follows:

Amount paid deputy marshals on district rolls	$50,590 00
Amount paid deputy marshals on supplementary rolls	7,155 00
Amount paid supervisors of election on district rolls	23,885 00
Amount paid deputy marshals on headquarters roll	3,925 00
Total	85,555 00
To extraordinary expenses incurred in enforcing the acts of Congress in relation to elections at the election held in the city of New York on the 5th of November, 1872	33,434 36

This makes a total of $118,989.36 that was expended in that city at the one election, and the report contains the accounts, which show that the marshals of each assembly district expended a large proportion of the money for "carriage hire."

CHARACTER, POLITICS, NECESSITY OF MARSHALS.

What is the character of the men thus appointed and paid by the Government? What are their politics? Is there a necessity for them? What has been their behavior?

Marshal Kerns, of Philadelphia, testifies before a committee of the Senate that he appointed seven hundred and seventy-three deputy marshals in 1878 and that he thought there was no necessity for them in Philadelphia. A sub-committee of that committee sat in Philadelphia two days in March, 1878, and in that time a large mass of testimony was taken. All of the marshals were shown to be republican workers, active in their respective localities, and among them were men whose personal characteristics may be judged from the following summary of the evidence touching them.

The testimony shows, too, that these marshals were used to enforce State restrictions, not Federal disqualification. Nearly every voter attacked was so attacked for non-payment of taxes. Are we so powerless that we must ask the Federal Government to enforce our own statutes?

PHILADELPHIA MARSHALS.

Charles Oliphant, marshal second division, Twentieth ward, drunk on election day and insulting voters; seized Mr. Hackenberg without cause.

Charles Herr, marshal second division, Twenty-ninth ward, character and reputation bad, had been arrested for crime. On election day he arrested a voter, who was released by Judge Hare and voted. Herr wore a badge, and solicited votes as a republican.

Arthur Vance, marshal eighth division, Fifth ward, arrested Hutchinson, a voter, without cause. Vance was a notorious republican worker.

John Homeyard, marshal sixth division, Sixth ward, drunk, and arrested voters without cause; drew a club on a democrat for challenging a negro repeater. The police blocked up the poll, acted in concert with Homeyard, and brought voters to polls. Homeyard vouched for republican voters and distributed republican tickets. Shriver, a United States revenue officer, kept republican window-book.

J. R. Desano, marshal first division, Fifth ward, drunk all day; too drunk to arrest any one. There were five policemen at these polls. Desano never voted in that divison before that day.

James Brown, marshal fourteenth division, Fourth ward, record of his conviction in 1872 for voting illegally produced. Proof was made that he voted twice on the same day.

William Augustus, fourth division, Eighth ward, acted as marshal, assuming authority as such, but was not on the list; a republican worker.

Joseph Hilferty, marshal twenty-first division, Second ward, held the republican window-book all day and electioneered; threatened to arrest the democratic United States supervisor for procuring bail for a legal voter who had been arrested.

William McGowan, marshal twenty-third division, Second ward. A policeman blocked up the voting-window, and a democratic United States supervisor ordered him away, when McGowan and the policeman seized him and locked him up in the station-house on a charge of interfering with officers. The case was never tried. McGowan is employed in the gas office and paid by the city.

Charles N Miller, detective, testified that in seventeenth division of Nineteenth ward a gang of repeaters were brought to the polls by a letter-carrier; he had one of the gang arrested.

Philip Madden, marshal Fourth ward, one of the most dangerous men in the city, has been in prison twice, once for highway robbery, and the second time for shooting a colored boy.

Francis McNamee, marshal Eighth ward, had been arrested for five different robberies.

Andrew Lenoir, marshal First ward, a warrant has been issued for him for larceny.

Daniel Redding, marshal First ward, a bad and dangerous man; had been tried for murder.

Henry Pitts, marshal Seventh ward, a colored man who keeps a gambling-house and been arrested twice; distributed republican tickets and vouched for voters.

R. S. Stringfield, marshal Fifteenth ward, had been tried for shooting a man; character very bad.

Michael Slavin, marshal Fifth ward, a thief and notorious repeater; had been arrested for subornation of perjury but never tried.

William Glenn, marshal Nineteenth ward, superintendent of Norris square, and paid by the city for his duties.

Enoch Baker, marshal second division, Third ward, arrested John Carroll, a legal voter, without cause, and locked him up; Carroll was discharged after a hearing.

J. Roberts, marshal sixteenth division, Third ward, arrested John Johnson, a legal voter, and locked him up all night; case never tried. Roberts electioneered for the republican ticket; was a clerk in the gas office and paid by the city; there were also twelve to fourteen policemen at that poll all day, and they blocked up the poll.

Andrew Jackson, marshal twenty-second division, Thirtieth ward, employed in the gas works under the city. Ackerman, republican judge of elections, acted as United States supervisor and judge, and refused to vacate the place of judge after written orders by Marshal Kerns and Judge Elcook. Jackson arrested Feeny, who had been legally appointed judge, and took him away from the polls. Did not return to get possession until 2 p. m.

C. A. Pinnexson, marshal Thirtieth ward, aided in arresting Feeny.

—— Taylor, marshal fifteenth division, Third ward, arrested Sweeny for illegal voting and locked him up; charge was found to be false and he was released and voted.

James Calligan, marshal eighth division, Sixth ward, so drunk in the afternoon he could not walk; seized a qualified voter by the collar and staggered with him against the wall; policeman brought a repeater to the polls, who was arrested, as was the policeman.

Henry Scott, marshal second division, Seventh ward, a man of bad repute; colored; keeps a low drinking house; electioneered and gave out tickets and tax receipts; was inside at the counting of the vote, and took tickets out of the box; only 5 votes came out for the democratic candidate for Congress; democratic overseer contested this, and Scott allowed 17 to be counted for him.

Thomas Donlan, marshal seventh division, Sixth ward, an habitual drunkard, and a graduate of house of correction for this; was drunk all day.

William D. Barth, marshal; same place, blocked up the voting window and would not allow legal voters to come to it; there were two United States marshals and six policemen at this poll.

John Archer, marshal twenty-seventh division, Nineteenth ward, acted as United States supervisor; was on both lists and paid as both officers; when a marshal wanted during the day to arrest a republican repeater he did not make known that he was a deputy marshal; had no badge; heavy republican division; no policemen there.

Joseph T. Fuller, marshal sixth division, Twenty-third ward, a guard in the house of correction, and paid by the city.

William Stringfield, marshal thirty-second division, Twenty-fourth ward, arrested a legal voter and took him to the magistrate's, where he was discharged; Stringfield was discharged from employment the day before election for stealing.

Charles Male, marshal seventh division, Eleventh ward, keeps a house of prostitution.

Abraham Hoffman, marshal Eleventh ward, a repeater, and had kept a house of prostitution within a year; a thief.

William Eckenbrim, marshal Eleventh ward, arrested for larceny; bill ignored.

David Beckman, marshal thirty-second division, Nineteenth ward, held the republican window-book and electioneered; threatened to put the democratic United States supervisor out of the room for challenging a voter; the vote was rejected, and the voter did not return.

William B. Ahern, marshal ninth division, Twelfth ward, employed in the United States revenue office.

—— Fleming, marshal sixth division, Eighteenth ward, distributed republican tickets and challenged voters; a legal vote was rejected on his challenge; intimidated many democratic voters.

William Boehm, marshal eighteenth division, Twenty-ninth ward, plug inspector, and paid by the city; electioneered and distributed republican tickets.

Charles Prenderville, marshal seventeenth division, Fifth ward, arrested a legal voter; case never tried; electioneered for republicans all day.

This was the record of a two days' investigation at Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA ELECTIONS.

I now read from the report of Hon. S. S. Cox, chairman of a special committee of the House of Representatives for inquiring into elections in northern cities, (House Document No. 218, second session, Forty-fourth Congress,) relating to the election of 1876:

TWENTY THOUSAND WITH A RED CROSS.

The fact of the excessive registration in Philadelphia becomes more apparent when it is known that over twenty thousand of the names registered were successfully attacked, and the names stricken off or marked with a red cross. And it is a matter of no little surprise that over nine-tenths of the names thus attacked in court were so attacked by democratic petitions. According to the evidence, the courts to which those petitions were returned were engaged for a month previous to the election in trying those cases alone; and but for want of time very many more names would have been stricken off, ninety petitions which had been returned not having been reached in the investigation by the courts.

According to the testimony of Mr. Thomas Fahy, one of the commissioners of the city of Philadelphia, there were eighty-two hundred and eighty-two names stricken absolutely from the list, and twelve thousand or thirteen thousand marked with a red cross under order of the courts, they being in doubt as to whether to draw a red line through them and strike them off absolutely, or to put a red cross opposite them, which would signify that they were dead, or removed from the division within sixty days of the election, and consequently not proper names to be on the registration list. A large majority of those eighty-two hundred and eighty-two were myths, people who had no existence in fact; and the same with a large proportion of the twelve thousand or thirteen thousand marked with a red cross, though many of them had doubtless died or moved from the division in which their names appeared. The evil of this matter, and the bad use to which this system is put, is in this: that names appearing on the registration list could be used on the day of election by repeaters and personators almost without possibility of detection; and the system of personating and repeating appears to be largely in vogue in that city. Under the law a man by merely giving a name appearing on the registration list is permitted to vote on the production of his tax receipt or on his swearing that he has paid his taxes within two years. Hence the purpose of leaving improper and mythical names on the list in order that they may be used by repeaters or personators.

The testimony of Charles Henry Jones, esq., attorney, corroborates entirely the evidence of Mr. Fahy in regard to the fact above alluded to.

The evidence shows that in very many instances there were large and excessive registration lists, in some cases having double the number of names that legitimately ought to have been registered, and it cannot be accidental that in a great number of republican divisions the list was largely excessive. It therefore appears to your committee that the assessors, in very many instances, committed a great breach of duty in certifying names to the county commissioners which were not those of bona fide residents of their divisions, but under the law the assessors can protect themselves from detection, to a great degree, by leaving improper names, or names of those removed or dead, on their lists; thereby making a false registration, when they could not do so by adding false or fictitious names; but the first means would answer the fraudulent end as well or better than the last, because it would seem to have the form of law. That the party in power in Philadelphia, since the adoption of the new constitution, has pursued this course, thereby causing an excessive and illegal registration on which to vote by repeaters or personators, there can be but little doubt.

* * * * * * *

It is established by the testimony that the office-holders and appointees, Federal, State, and municipal, in Philadelphia are from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand in number, and that they are almost entirely republicans, every one of whom, according to the testimony of Mr. Welsh, is appointed and holds his place for partisan purposes. In reaching a conclusion in reference to the management of political affairs in Philadelphia, the committee have relied much on the testimony of this gentleman, a venerable and well-known citizen of that community, and a republican. According to his testimony it has long been the custom in Philadelphia to swell the list of employés in the various departments of the city government enormously, just previous to an election, and he unhesitatingly asserted that the increased number of employés was appointed not only that their own votes might be, as they were, controlled by those who gave them their places, but because they were supposed to control a certain additional number of votes.

I also read from the testimony of Hon. William Welsh, of Philadelphia, taken before that committee. Mr. Welsh is now deceased, but will be remembered as the Indian commissioner and as a man of the very highest character:

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. 1122 Spruce street, Philadelphia.
Q. What is your official position in connection with the city of Philadelphia?
A. I am president of the board of directors of city trusts.

Q. Have you any knowledge as to the number of officials—State, national, and city—in the city of Philadelphia?
A. No, sir; I have no knowledge as to that beyond what most intelligent citizens have. I believe there are twelve hundred to thirteen hundred policemen, and the number of street pavers and others depends upon the approach of the time of election. The number may be increased four or five fold immediately before the election. It is not a given number.
Q. It fluctuates according to the supposed interests of the time?
A. I suppose the Government can extend that influence to ten thousand people in Philadelphia. Taking the twelve hundred men on the police, and the grog-shops that are under their influence by reason of their allowing the back doors to be open—give me these twelve hundred men, with their present powers, and I could control 10,000 votes.
Q. The policemen, however, are only a small part of the officials of Philadelphia?
A. Only a part. As we approach election the General Government and the city government unite in giving thousands of people temporary employment in the navy-yard and elsewhere, and they are drilled thoroughly to carry lanterns in torch-light processions, and to vote.

* * * * * * *

Q. Did not you in your report make any reference whatever to the number of men employed in the different departments of the city government, and their influence in political matters?
A. Nothing whatever, sir; it would have been wholly out of place in such a report.
Q. Can you state approximately the number of men so employed in all the various departments of the city government?
A. I should be afraid to make a statement of that, because it would not have that sort of basis as I would like it to have. Just previous to a contested election I should estimate the number to be twice or three times as large as the ordinary number. I would have to fix some special period before I could make an estimate.
Q. At these seasons of political excitement, just previous to any hotly contested election, such as the last election for President and Congressmen, what was the number?
A. To give a crude guess, I should estimate it at five thousand voters, with ability to influence five thousand more. These men are selected not only because they are bound to vote thus, but because they are supposed to control a certain number of votes. If a man now gets an office under the city government he gets it because he has a certain amount of influence in his district and can control a certain number of votes.
Q. Has this been the practice?
A. As I understand it that is the practice. Each man has his office by reason of his ability to control a certain number of votes.
Q. Is that carried out through all the various departments of the city, so far as you know?
A. So far as I know, in the departments that are under political influence, it is carried on.
Q. That is part of the machinery of the political system here?
A. Yes, sir; on the part of the ruling party.
Q. Have you not been combating that state of things as well as you have been able?
A. I could hardly say that I have been doing it as fully as I should have done. I have had a little extra duty with the General Government on the Indian question, which has occupied a good deal of my time, but my colleagues have been working harder than I have. We have enlisted for the war, and mean to stick at it until we get a municipal reform. This movement is fermenting now in the various wards of the city. Things have not yet got quite bad enough for me. I should like to have anarchy for a couple of months and then we can get things right.

MARSHALS IN NEW YORK.

There were about thirteen hundred deputy marshals appointed in New York in 1878. In 1870 a large number were there appointed, of some of whom the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] in his place, on May 17, 1879, gave a list. Of those who were appointed marshals and supervisors in 1870 for the election at which the Federal troops were prepared to be used, these are specimens:

J. F. Baderhop, appointed by this estimable Judge Woodruff, at the instance of some of my friend's "bucket-men" in New York, some of those "shoulder-hitters" and "rat-pit heroes:"

"Theodore, alias Mike Anthony, alias Snuffey, of 24 Cherry street, a laborer, thirty-five years of age, married, and cannot read or write. Anthony was arrested by Detective James Finn, of the fourth precinct, on July 24, 1870, for larceny from the person, and was held in $2,000 bail for trial by Justice Hogan. He was indicted by the grand jury on the charge on the 23d of August last.

"Joseph Frazier, of 279 Water street, is a thief and confederate of thieves."

That is, a union thief. [Laughter.]

"James Miller is the keeper of a den of prostitution in the basement of 339 Water street.

"James Tinnigan keeps a similar den in the basement of 337 Water street.

"James Sullivan, alias Slocum, keeps a house of prostitution at 330 Water street, which is a resort for desperate thieves.

"Frank Winkle keeps a house of prostitution at 337½ Water street. The police are frequently called in to quell fights in Winkle's place, and it bears a hard reputation."

Now I come to a good fellow, a great chap. Of course it could not be supposed that the present chief of the supervisors in New York could appoint now any character holding as high a position as this one evidently does in that fraternity:

"The radical authorities have appointed one John, alias 'Buckey,' McCabe a supervisor of the eighth district, Fifteenth ward. He is now under indictment for shooting a man with intent to kill. This precious 'supervisor' originated here, and was first known to the police for his dexterity in robbing emigrants. His picture is in the 'rogues' gallery' at police headquarters in this city, No. 225. He was known as Pat Maddon, alias 'Old Sow,' alias Honsey Nichols, alias Dennis McCabe. His real name is Andrew Andrews. His wife resides in North Pearl street, and the 'supervisor' of the eighth district, Fifteenth ward, New York, is down in the directory as a citizen of Albany.

"Joseph Hurtnett, supervisor Eighteenth ward. Arrested June 3, 1869, as accessory to the murder of Richard Gerdes, a grocer, corner of First avenue and Twenty-fourth street.

"Henry Rail, supervisor Eighth ward. One of the principals in the Chatham-street saloon murder; went off West to escape punishment, and has only been back a few weeks.

"James Moran, supervisor third district, Eighth ward. Arrested on Sunday last for felonious assault.

"William (alias Pomp) Harton, (colored,) marshal Twenty-second ward. Arrested a few days since for vagrancy.

"Theodore Allen—"

It appears to me my colleague and myself have a sort of recollection of that name—

"Theodore Allen, marshal Eighth ward. Now in prison for perjury and keeps a house, the resort of panel-thieves and pickpockets, on Mercer street."

He is in jail to-day for murder, or is out on bail being charged with murder. Now, who is this man The. Allen? He has been exported from New York into my State in order to interfere in the elections of Connecticut, not I agree by any Government action, not by action of the United States officers; far be it from me to make a charge of that character; but he is well known in our State. One of his brothers served a sentence of six or seven years in the State prison of Connecticut. Another one of them staid in the inside of our jail at Hartford on a charge of burglary longer than he cared to, and so one night he left, and they have not heard of him since in Connecticut. His name is not in this list, but the family are a rising family of honest republicans!

"Richard O'Connor, supervisor seventh district, First ward; has been for years receiver of smuggled cigars from Havana steamer.

"L. H. Cargill, supervisor ninth district, Ninth ward; tried in United States court for robbing the mail.

"John Van Buren, supervisor twelfth district, Eighth ward; was at one time in sheriff's office and discharged for carrying a load of seized goods from the establishment of Richard Walters in East Broadway.

"Mart Allen, marshal Eighth ward; served a term of five years in the Connecticut State prison; sentenced to Sing Sing for five years by Judge Bedford. His case was appealed, and while waiting for decision he managed to get out on bail. His case has been decided against him, and he has fled to parts unknown to ply his vocation and help the radicals elsewhere.

"John McChesney, supervisor fourth district Ninth ward; associates with thieves; bears a bad character generally.

"William Cassidy, supervisor twelfth district, Ninth ward; is a street bummer, without any visible means of support.

"Thomas McIntire, marshal Eighth ward; has been frequently arrested for beating his aged mother; sent several times to Blackwell's Island.

"Timothy Lynch, marshal sixth district, First ward; a Washington-market lounger.

"Peter Mose, marshal Sixth ward; habitual drunkard.

"John Conner, supervisor first district, First ward; keeps a disorderly gin-mill, resort of lowest characters.

"Francis Jordan, supervisor sixth district, First ward; lives in New Jersey; was turned out of the post-office by Postmaster Jones for bad conduct.

"Bernard Dugan, supervisor eighth district, First ward; habitual drunkard. His wife left him on account of his drunkenness, and procured a divorce on that ground.

"John Tobin, supervisor ninth district, First ward; arrested about six months ago for grand larceny.

"Patrick Murphy, supervisor fourth district, Sixth ward; two years ago distributed fraudulent naturalization papers, and would furnish them to anybody that would promise to vote for Grant.

"Edward Slevin, jr., supervisor second district, Fourth ward; has an indictment now pending against him in court of general sessions for cutting a boy named Kilkenny.

"Michael Foley, supervisor fourth district, Fourth ward; well-known repeater, voting for anybody that will pay.

"James F. Day, supervisor seventh district, Fourth ward; shot at a man in a fight between the Walsh association and a gang from Water street.

"John Conners, 'alias Jockey,' supervisor third district, Fourth ward; a well-known desperate character.

"Michael Costello, marshal Sixth ward; bounty-jumper during the war.

"Harry Rice, supervisor thirteenth district, Sixth ward; was connected with the Chatham-street concert saloon murder, and fled to Nebraska to escape punishment.

"Thomas Lane, supervisor seventeenth district, Sixth ward; formerly keeper of a notorious den at Five Points, headquarters of thieves and robbers.

"John Lane, supervisor twenty-second district, same ward; was indicted for receiving stolen goods. Has served a term in Sing Sing.

"Edward Foley, supervisor sixth district, Ninth ward; arrested last year for stealing a watch.

"Humphrey Ayers, supervisor eighteenth district, Ninth ward; arrested six years ago for robbing the United States mail.

"John Dowling, supervisor nineteenth district, Ninth ward; arrested August 20, 1869, for till-tapping.

"James Fitzsimmons, supervisor twentieth district, Ninth ward; arrested August 1, 1868, for robbery.

"John Martin, supervisor fifth district, Twelfth ward; arrested a few years ago under an indictment for arson.

"Samuel Rich, supervisor fourth district, Thirteenth ward; served a term of two years at Sing Sing for felonious assault.

"John, alias 'Buckey,' McCabe, supervisor eighth district, Fifteenth ward; charged with shooting a man with intent to kill about a year ago.

"William P. Burke, supervisor twentieth district, Eighth ward; served his term in the State prison of Massachusetts for burglary; also two years in the New York State prison.

"James McCabe, supervisor fourth district, Eighth ward; now confined in the Tombs under indictment for highway robbery.

"William Irving, supervisor fourteenth district, Eighth ward; has served a term in Sing Sing prison for burglary committed in the Eighth ward, and has never been pardoned.

"Patrick Henry Kily, alias Fred. Williams, supervisor twenty-second district, Eighth ward; keeper of a house of ill-fame; resort of the lowest and vilest characters.

"Patrick Hefferman, supervisor of the tenth district, Sixth ward; arrested some time since for attempted murder.

"Frederick Sterringer, supervisor Eighth ward; has been arrested several times for keeping disorderly house.

"J. F. Baderhop, supervisor Tenth ward; arrested for murder a few years since.

"Ed. Weaver, marshal in Eighth ward; has been but a short time out of State prison, where he has been serving out his sentence.

"Walter Prince, (colored,) marshal Eighth ward; now in prison awaiting trial for highway robbery.

"Andrew Andrews, alias Hans Nicols, marshal; panel-thief; been sentenced two or three times to State prison, and has just returned from Blackwell's Island."

I read this from page 1636 of the Congressional Globe for the Forty-first Congress, third session, February 24, 1871.

Now, Mr. President, I ask, will honorable men, honorable Senators of the United States, say here in their places on the floor of the Senate that a system that is carried and has to be carried out in this nefarious manner—for it is nefarious—is a proper system to be adopted in this country of ours? Sir, I say no, a thousand times no. These men, these thieves, these murderers, these highway robbers, the men to supervise an election in the city of New York in the interest of a free ballot!

WHAT THEY COST.

The cost to the people of this system of terrorizing them at elections in New York City by roughs and thieves, and the way their money is spent, may be seen from the following extracts from the report of Caulfield's committee made August 5, 1876, (Report H. R. No. 800, first session Forty-fourth Congress:)

After taking Whitley's testimony on the 23d March, 1876, the committee recalled him about the 13th of April, and he testified that he was ordered first by Attorney-General Akerman and afterward by Attorney-General Williams to pay to Davenport the money out of this $50,000 annual appropriation; that in 1871 he paid him $5,000; in 1872, during the presidential campaign, he paid him $20,000, and afterward, in the next year, $4,000, making in all $34,000. He says he did not know what Davenport was to do with the money, but he always objected to paying it to him. He testified that the Attorney-General told him he had received a request from the President to pay it to Davenport, and he (Whitley) therefore obeyed orders. He said Davenport was a politician in New York, and was in no way connected with him in the secret-service department.

Notwithstanding the payment of $34,000 of Government money out of the ku-klux fund to Davenport, there is not the slightest evidence in the Attorney-General's Office or any Department of the Government to show that he ever received a dollar of this fund for any purpose. (See page 28, part 2.)

Your committee is much impressed with the conviction that Mr. Davenport was not wholly unselfish in the interest he took in the passage of these laws, as we find that as soon as the laws were passed he was called upon to fill the chief offices created by them, until now he holds no less than four offices, to-wit: United States commissioner, chief supervisor of elections, clerk United States circuit court, and master in chancery.

The first of these laws which Mr. Davenport says he was instrumental in having passed is the enforcement act of May 8, 1870. This law is made to provide in section 9 for an increase in the number of United States commissioners, and in section 12 for their fees.

Mr. Davenport says, (page 42,) in answer to the question, "How long have you been United States commissioner?" "Some time in 1870, I think about August;" just after the passage of the law. The next law which he was instrumental in passing, as he says, is the act to amend the naturalization laws, which provides in section 5 for the appointment of supervisors of elections.

The next act which he is instrumental in passing is the law to amend an act "to enforce the rights of citizens to vote," wherein it is provided, in section 13, that the court shall appoint one of these United States commissioners chief supervisor of elections. This act was approved February 28, 1871. Mr. Davenport is asked, (page 42,) "How long have you been chief supervisor of elections?" He answered, "Ever since the law was passed, which, I think, was on February 28, 1871."

Mr. Davenport says that the aforesaid act (under which he was appointed chief supervisor) was amended by the act of June 10, 1872, chapter 415, volume 17, at his expense of $80 for telegraphing to and from Washington.

It will be remembered that June 10, 1872, was at the beginning of the presidential campaign of 1872.

This amendment, procured by Davenport, under the head of "judiciary," as he says, provides "for defraying the expenses of the courts, &c., for jurors and witnesses," &c., "and for the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act relative to the rights of the citizens to vote," of February 28, 1871, (providing for the appointment of chief supervisor,) as above given, "$3,200,000; of which sum $200,000 shall be available for the present fiscal year."

Under the same head, page 350, and in the same law, is the appropriation of the sum of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General, for what is known as the ku-klux fund, for the "detection and prosecution of crime," &c.

We find Davenport, one month after this, gets from Whitley, as shown by his receipt, $5,000; on the 26th of September, $10,000; October 11, $5,000; in all $20,000 during the presidential campaign of 1872.

In addition to this, the testimony shows (see page 142) that, in the winter of 1871 and 1872, Davenport got from the committee of seventy between $8,000 and $10,000 "for services performed." In addition to this sum, we find that Mr. Davenport rendered a bill to the Government for the election of November, 1872, which is given on page 34, for $18,630.35. This bill is for expenses incurred for payments to himself, which are provided for by the law of February 28, 1871, section 14, which he was instrumental in having passed, fixing the fees of chief supervisor, and which is as follows:

In the matter of the account of John I. Davenport, as chief supervisor of elections southern district of New York, for services rendered and expenses incurred at the election held on the 5th day of November, 1872, at which Representatives in Congress were chosen.

VOORHEES ON DAVENPORT.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] in his place, in the Senate, with that magnificent diction so peculiarly his own, says:

But in the present instance we have vastly more than the mere menace or threat of future subjugation by virtue of the laws under discussion. We are not left to conjecture what will be done hereafter. Already these laws have been executed over the prostrate forms and liberties of American citizens in a manner and to an extent which would arouse any people in Europe to revolt, except, perhaps, the serfs of Russia. I speak not now of the South, which has so long been considered a legitimate prey to the spoiler, but of the great, dominant, and stalwart North. Look to New York, that mighty emporium of the wealth and commerce of the western hemisphere. Scenes have been enacted there within the last few years which bring shame and disgrace to the Republic wherever they are known. John I. Davenport is chief supervisor of elections in the city of New York, appointed by the circuit court of the United States. He is also the clerk of the United States circuit court, and a United States commissioner. With all the powers of these manifold official positions combined in his own person he has indeed been the autocrat of the ballot-box. In the elections of 1876 he had under him one thousand and seventy supervisors, twenty-five hundred deputy marshals and an indefinite number of commissioners at an expense for them and for himself of $94,587.

In 1878 he employed twelve hundred and twenty-five supervisors, thirteen hundred and fifty deputy marshals, and commissioners in proportion, for all whose pay and expenses he drew upon the money of the people in the Treasury. In June, 1876, as clerk of the United States circuit court, he issued warrants for the arrest of twenty-six hundred naturalized voters to be brought before him as United States commissioner and chief supervisor for the purpose of making them surrender their naturalization papers. The Federal courts themselves afterward held that the naturalization papers in question were all legal and valid, but the desired result had been accomplished. The terror inspired by these arrests intimidated thousands from going to the polls. It became well known that there was no personal security in New York in connection with the elections, and the poor, the timid, and the humble staid away. The same course was pursued in 1878. During the summer of that year nine thousand four hundred citizens were notified that they would be arrested unless they surrendered their naturalization papers to the head overseer, John I. Davenport. In the month of October, 1878, thirty-one hundred persons were actually arrested and a reign of terror inaugurated just in advance of the election. The pretense that these persons held fraudulent naturalization papers had already been shown to be false, but it was necessary to party success that an alarm should be raised and a panic created in the minds of foreign-born citizens and of the poor laboring classes generally.

The movement was successful, and it has been estimated that ten thousand legal voters remained away from the polls rather than risk the jails and the prison-pens of the chief supervisor and his subordinates. But it was reserved for the day of election itself to give free scope to the frightful powers with which this band of Federal ku-klux is invested. Those who braved the dangers which environed the ballot-box, and approached it as if they were still freemen soon found their mistake. They quickly ascertained that the previous threats and warnings which they had heard were neither idle nor unmeaning. As a specimen of thousands of similar occurrences on election day, I quote a statement recently made by a member of the other branch of Congress from New York. Speaking from his place on the floor he said:

"A neighbor of mine, who had resided in the same district for seventeen years, and a soldier of the Union Army at that, was arrested. I was asked to go to the republican headquarters in an adjoining district, whither he had been taken. The street for an entire block was lined with carriages, in which the unfortunate citizens who had fallen into the hands of the Philistines had been or were to be conveyed. When I entered the building I found the front room decorated with the paraphernalia of a political headquarters and filled with republican politicians. In the back room a United States commissioner was holding court. The door was closed, watched by a Cerberus. No one was allowed inside but the prisoners and the republican managers. After about half an hour's waiting I was informed by the doorkeeper that the man I was looking for was no longer there. I asked whither he had been taken. 'Suppose to Fort Davenport,' was the laconic reply."

The following description of election day in Davenport's court, in New York, is said to be but a tame and imperfect presentment of the facts as they there transpire from year to year as the elections occur:

"Such a scene as the rooms of this court presented on that election day has never before been witnessed in this city or in this country, and it is to be hoped never will again. From early morning until after the polls were closed these rooms were packed and jammed with a mass of prisoners and marshals. Not only were they crowded beyond their capacity, but the halls and corridors were thronged with those who were unable to obtain admission, so that the counsel representing the prisoners and the bondsmen who were offered to secure their release had the greatest difficulty and were frequently unsuccessful in obtaining entrance. In addition to all this was that delectable iron 'pen' on the upper floor, in which men were crowded until it resembled the black hole of Calcutta, and where they were kept for hours hungry, thirsty, suffering in every way, until their cases could be reached. With scarcely an exception these men had gone to the polls expecting to be absent but a short time. Many of them were thinly clad; numbers had sick wives or relatives; some were sick themselves. There were carmen who had left their horses standing in the public streets, men whose situations depended on their speedy return; men who wished to leave the city on certain trains. Every imaginable vexation, inconvenience, injury, and wrong which the mind can conceive existed in their cases, so that it was painful for the counsel who were endeavoring to secure their release to approach sufficiently near the railing to hear their piteous appeals and witness the distress which they had no power to alleviate. And over all this pushing, struggling, complaining crowd, Mr. Commissioner John I. Davenport sat supreme, with a sort of oriental magnificence, calmly indifferent to everything but the single fact that no man who was arrested was allowed to vote."

MARSHALS IN ARKANSAS.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] says:

These outrages have been occurring all over the country. You need not go to New York in 1876 as the only time and place at which outrages have occurred, but further back than that. I want to read to you a report made seven or eight years ago upon this subject of United States marshals and upon their use at the polls by a republican Senate committee to a republican Senate. Here is what they say about it:

"In the first and third wards of the city of Little Rock the enforcement act and the United States marshals seem to have been employed in attempting to break up the legal polls after they were organized; while in the townships of Ashley, Badgett, and Campbell it and the United States marshals were used to vote 176 more votes in said townships than there were voters in them."

This was at the commencement of the employment of these United States marshals at the polls, and there was a report made to a republican Senate, by republican members of the Senate, that the United States marshals were thus used and united in the commission of the most infamous frauds ever perpetrated upon a free people.

That is not all they say; they say further:

"The heart grows sick and our confidence in the integrity of mankind sickens and grows less day by day as we probe the acts of corruption perpetrated in this country at the late election. Our sympathies are with the cause under whose banner these unblushing and barefaced frauds were committed, but we feel republicanism cannot prosper, nor does it deserve to prosper, by the use of means employed in Pulaski County, (Arkansas.)"

MARSHALS IN LOUISIANA.

I now read from the report of Mr. MORRISON, made February 1, 1877, to the House of Representatives on the subject of the elections in Louisiana in 1876, (Report 156, part 1, Forty-fourth Congress, second session, page 6:)

The United States marshal appointed and paid out of the United States Treasury eight hundred and forty deputy United States marshals for the parish of Orleans, city of New Orleans. They served from one to five days in keeping the peace and in the interest of a fair election, if the marshal is to be believed. The character of the men appointed and nature of the service rendered by them is aptly explained by one of them, John McDonald, who testified before the committee. He lived on the wharf; lodged nowhere, and had no particular employment; was appointed and sworn in on the 6th; got one hundred and fifty colored men in the club-room and kept them there all night of the 6th; supplied them with republican tickets at three or four o'clock on the morning of the 7th, and carried his poll for the republican party. Besides the eight hundred and forty deputy marshals for New Orleans, many hundreds were appointed for the country parishes who served without compensation, some of them going from New Orleans to the country parishes as a mere patriotic duty, without compensation, if the testimony of the United States marshal is to be credited.

With all the election machinery in their control, to use which in the republican interest the officials, State and Federal, did not scruple, and after the employment of all means, honest and otherwise, at their command, in that interest, when the commissioners of election opened the ballot-boxes on the evening of November 7 they were found to contain a majority of 7,639 votes for the Tilden electors. Then the conspirators appealed to the returning board.

MARSHALS IN SAINT LOUIS.

A leading gentleman from Ohio, Mr. EWING, says:

In response to the demand to cite instances of the bad use of marshals and supervisors in controlling elections I take one case, the election for Congressmen in Saint

Louis in 1876. I hold in my hand the uncontradicted testimony in the contested-election case last Congress of Frost vs. Metcalfe. It appears from it that E. T. Allen was appointed by the circuit court chief supervisor for the city of Saint Louis. He testifies that there was no occasion for the appointment of deputy marshals at that election, as the elections in Saint Louis had been theretofore peaceful and fair. Leffingwell, the United States marshal for that district, was of the same opinion, and refused to appoint any special deputies. Thereupon one D. W. D. Barnard, a national-bank examiner, who was an old acquaintance of General Grant, and who had got Leffingwell his appointment as marshal, went to Leffingwell and said, (I quote from Barnard's own deposition:)

"'You have got instructions from the Attorney-General to enforce the laws of the United States.' 'Yes, sir.' 'If you don't execute your orders I will see that you are not marshal much longer. The man that makes can unmake.' Then said he to me, 'What am I to do?' I said to him, 'I can relieve you of that dilemma. Give me control of those marshals,' and he says, 'I will do it.'

"Question. Well, did he do it?

"Answer. I think so, sir.

"Q. Was there any more necessity for the appointment of marshals for that election than for any previous election?

"A. Oh, well, you gentlemen know very well that in a political struggle for party ascendency it is necessary for the co-ordinate branches of the Government to be in accord; and there was an effort on the part, so I interpreted it, of the party which I acted with to gain control of the House of Representatives."

One thousand and twenty-eight deputy marshals were thus appointed in Saint Louis to work for the election of the three republican candidates for Congress. A large part of them were democrats. They were selected through a Mr. John Codding and other reliable republican partisans. Democrats were preferred as deputies, provided they pledged themselves to vote for the republican candidates for Congress. Thomas Barrett, J. F. Ryan, N. W. Devoy, Michael Carroll, Matthew Horan, and Michael Welsh testified that they were appointed deputy marshals on the distinct condition that they would vote for the republican candidate, and that others were appointed on the same pledge. Carroll testified that, after some talk about his politics, Codding said:

"'I tell you, I don't care a d——n what you are; I want you to do one thing, and I will get you the commission.' Says I, 'what is that one thing?' Says he, 'if you will vote for Metcalfe I will get you a commission. That's all I want you to do. I don't care what you do for the rest of the party. I want you to vote for Metcalfe.' He asked if I would promise to do that, and I told him yes; and then he went and got my commission, and brought it and handed it to me."

Thomas McNamara, a deputy marshal, testified that he was appointed eight days before the election, and was instructed "to move around the ward" and do all he could to help Metcalfe, the republican candidate for Congress. The deputy marshals were given lists of the voters, prepared by the republican central committee, and went from house to house inquiring whether the voters would be at home on election day. Whenever the answer was not positive, if the voter inquired about was a democrat, his name was marked for challenge or arrest. Witness said he took the oath as deputy marshal, and prepared to do the duty he was put there for.

"Question. Now, what duty were you put there for?"

"Answer I had understood I was put there for Mr. Metcalfe's interest."

The marshals were divided into companies under captains, and Michael Welch testifies that his company were instructed on election day by their captain, O'Connor, "to bring in (that is, arrest) all the democrats they could, and keep them from voting—damn them!"

By the expenditure of $20,000 in hiring these one thousand and twenty-eight bummers, and by marking five thousand seven hundred names of registered democratic voters for intimidation by challenge or arrest, the city of Saint Louis, which returned three democratic Congressmen at a fair and peaceful election in 1874, was made to return three republican Congressmen in 1876.

Bank Examiner Barnard was not disposed to hide his light under a bushel, but came to Washington to report to the Grant administration the manner of his success in electing three republican Congressmen from three democratic districts. In his testimony he reports an interview with Attorney-General Taft. He says:

"Mr. Taft asked Mr. Mudd how many marshals he had. Mr. Mudd referred him to me, and said I had charge of the marshals; and he turned to me, and I said, 'One thousand and twenty-eight' The old gentleman wheels round in his chair, and says, 'Were there no others out in Missouri you could have made marshals?' Says I, 'Mr. Taft, we went in to win,' * * * and he said, 'You bring a good deal of sugar in your spade.'"

Recollect, gentlemen, that this entire statement as to the execution of the Federal election laws in Saint Louis by the Grant administration is taken from the testimony given in a contested-election case in due form of law two years ago, where both parties were represented by counsel, and that its truth has never been questioned.

Thomas Barrett says, on page 154:

Question. Were you informed by him that you couldn't get the appointment as United States marshal unless you voted for a republican Congressman?

Answer. He told me himself I couldn't be appointed unless under those conditions I should vote for the republican Congressman. The rest of the ticket he said he didn't care about.

Cross-examination by the counsel for the contestee, George H. Shields:

Q. You promised you would vote for the republican ticket to get the appointment?

A. Yes.

Q. And in order to get the appointment you willfully told him a lie?

A. Well, I didn't consider it was any of his business if he would appoint me. It was Government money that was to pay me, which had no right to be used in the interest of one man. It didn't matter what he was. That's the way I looked at it.

James Francis Ryan, another deputy marshal, testifies on page 158:

Question. Did he make that a condition for you to vote for Congressman?

Answer. Yes; that I should vote for Congressman.

Q. Or else you couldn't get an appointment?

A. Or else I couldn't get an appointment.

Nicholas W. Dervy, another deputy marshal, says on page 199:

Question. Did he make it a condition that you should vote for the republican Congressman before you received your appointment?

(Counsel for contestee objected; let him state the facts.)

Answer. Well, that is what he said. As long as I said I would vote for Metcalfe I would get my commission. So he brought me in the room right next to the United States marshal, Leffingwell, and gave me my commission.

Q. What were your politics?

A. Democrat.

John Berg, another deputy marshal, says on page 246:

Question. Now, have you any objection to telling who you voted for for Congress?

Answer. I voted for L. S. Metcalfe, I think his name is.

Q. Now what consideration moved you to vote for L. S. Metcalfe?

A. Well, I voted for Mr. Metcalfe more because them fellows put me in that club; and they put me on as United States deputy marshal, and then I thought it was no more than just to vote for him; otherwise, if I could not have been a deputy marshal, I would not have voted for him, and I guess they would not have put me on as marshal nohow unless they thought I was a republican.

Q. Those were the considerations that moved you to vote for Metcalfe?

A. Yes, sir.

THE CRY OF "STOP THIEF!"

I venture to quote in extenso the eloquent and earnest argument that follows. I know its author [Mr. BRAGG] will pardon me, for I can only thus repeat his admirable logic:

During this debate this Hall has resounded with the cry of fraudulent voting on the part of the democrats. Every man of the opposition has shouted fraud and charges us with intended perpetration of frauds in the future as the incentive for repeal of this law. Let us for a moment stop and inquire when this era of fraud commenced. Under what dynasty, under the operation of what laws, did this fraud upon the ballot-box commence, and when did we first hear of it, and who originated it, and for what purpose? All the cries of fraud that have been heard from the other side of the Chamber point to a fraudulent management and conduct of the ballot-boxes when they have been in charge of supervisors, and have been surrounded by a cordon of deputy marshals under these offensive laws. Now, if the argument in defense of the maintenance of this class of officers is that their purpose is to prevent fraud, while the result is that by their creation we have induced and fostered fraud, then certainly these officers have outlived their usefulness, and the sooner we dispose of them the better. We claim, Mr. Chairman, that they are the agents of fraud; that the purpose of their appointment is fraud; that they are appointed to surround the ballot box for the purpose of deterring those among the laboring classes of foreign birth who may choose to vote the democratic ticket, and to secure safe entrance into the ballot-box of just so many ballots as may be offered by any person no matter what his character or how often he may have voted, provided he be "one of the elect" and vote the republican ticket. They surround the box; they stand as a protection to the box against our votes; but they stand so that they may guard all those who come to that box desiring to vote their ticket, whether they be qualified or not. And the fearful democratic frauds are devices of these republican officials, who, under the hue and cry of "stop thief," hope to divert attention from themselves while they intimidate the honest laborer from voting by fear of arrest on false charge, while they stuff the ballot-box, and profit by crumbs of Federal patronage dealt out with lavish hand.

Radicals sneer when we talk of an honest voter being intimidated or deterred from voting. They say, "Show us your intimidated man." Arrest and imprisonment are not always essential to intimidation It exists in its most effective form without actual arrest and seizure. It is the presence of the official coupled with the power to do wrong, and with the well-understood feeling in the community that it is their disposition to carry out that power whenever it becomes necessary for the accomplishment of their purposes, that forms the strongest element of intimidation. The deputy marshals may be convicts, as the testimony shows they have been in many instances; they may be murderers, pickpockets, thieves, frequenters of houses of ill-fame—men of the very lowest grade of society, men whose touch is an abomination; yet they are clothed with the badge of the Federal Government, and they stand there representing the Federal power in all its majesty. They have no scruples of conscience, and the people know that their presence there, if it be obnoxious to them, means arrest, confinement, the taking them away from their families and children, who are dependent upon them for daily bread. This is the intimidation that is wrought by these people, and the number of men who are so deterred from voting is legion in every municipality where the marshals are put in requisition.

MILITARY FORCE DESTRUCTIVE OF FREEDOM.

The programme of the President and the stalwarts is not complete without the right to use Federal troops to aid Federal marshals in controlling State voters, and this is the natural refuge of a strong government. It is destructive to the very essence of free institutions, and if conceded by the people will subvert the Government.

I quote from many authorities to prove what ought to be self-evident.

The effort now is to govern from above and not from below. The doctrine is, the people were made to be governed, not the people made the government. Centralization, consolidation, Federal rule, kingly power will be the results of subverting the power of the States to control suffrage.

Daniel Webster, in his oration upon the completion of the monument upon the battle-ground of Bunker Hill, said:

Quite too frequent resort is made to military force; and quite too much of the substance of the people is consumed in maintaining armies, not for defense against foreign aggression, but for enforcing obedience to domestic authority. Standing armies are the oppressive instruments for governing the people in the hands of hereditary and arbitrary monarchs. A military republic, a government founded on mock elections and supported only by the sword, is a movement indeed, but a retrograde and disastrous movement, from the regular and old-fashioned monarchical systems. If men would enjoy the blessings of republican government they must govern themselves by reason, by mutual counsel and consultation, by a sense and feeling of general interest, and by the acquiescence of the minority in the will of the majority, properly expressed; and, above all, the military must be kept, according to the language of our bill of rights, in strict subordination to the civil authority. Wherever this lesson is not both learned and practiced there can be no political freedom. Absurd, preposterous is it, a scoff and a satire on free forms of constitutional liberty, for frames of government to be prescribed by military leaders, and the right of suffrage to be exercised at the point of the sword.—Works of Daniel Webster, volume 1, pages 98 and 99.

George Ticknor Curtis, referring to the power and duty of the Federal Government to interfere in elections in the States, says:

Upon these theories a practice has grown up of stationing Federal troops at the polls—a practice, the anticipation of which, if it could have been foreseen when the Constitution was framed, we may be sure would not only have prevented the introduction of the clause above quoted, but would have rendered the establishment of any national constitution an impossibility. I know not whence the advocates and partisans of this practice derive the power so to use the Army of the United States. If they seek for it in the clause relating to Federal elections, they seek it in a place where every sound constitutional lawyer will tell them it is not to be found. They ought to know that no people have long tolerated such a practice and preserved their liberties. It is the very practice by which the French Republic in our own times was converted into an empire, and it cannot go on in this Republic without sooner or later leading to the same kind of result. It matters not in whose hands the executive power may be. If one party can wield such a weapon, another party can adopt it in turn; and between them, in their struggles for supremacy, our liberties will be overthrown.

The present Secretary of State, Hon. William M. Evarts, spoke thus:

I must confess that the news that came from Louisiana a few days ago has profoundly alarmed me. A thing has happened which has never happened in this country before, and which nobody, I trust, ever thought possible.

When the Legislature convened—and I repeat, it convened according to law, at the time and in the place fixed by law, called to order by the very officer designated by law—those persons were claimants for seats on the ground of the votes they had; some of them presenting claims so strong on the ground of majorities so large that even such a returning board as Louisiana had did not dare to decide against them; and when they had been seated in the Legislature organized as I have described, United States soldiers with fixed bayonets decided the case against them and took them out of the legislative hall by force. When that had been done the conservative members left that hall in a body with a solemn protest. The United States soldiery kept possession of it; and then, under their protection, the republicans organized the Legislature to suit themselves.

There is another thing which especially the American people hold sacred as the life element of their republican freedom. It is the right to govern and administer their local affairs independently, through the exercise of that self-government which lives and has its being in the organism of the States; and, therefore, we find in the Constitution of the Republic the power of the National Government to interfere in State affairs most scrupulously limited to certain well-defined cases and the observance of certain strictly prescribed forms; and if these limitations be arbitrarily disregarded by the national authority, and if such violation be permitted by the Congress of the United States, we shall surely have reason to say that our system of republican government is in danger.

I cannot, therefore, escape from the deliberate conviction, a conviction conscientiously formed, that the deed done on the 4th of January in the state-house of the State of Louisiana by the military forces of the United States constitutes a gross and manifest violation of the Constitution and the laws of this Republic. We have an act before us indicating a spirit in our Government which either ignores the Constitution and the laws or so interprets them that they cease to be the safeguard of the independence of legislation and of the rights and liberties of our people. And that spirit shows itself in a shape more alarming still in the instrument the Executive has chosen to execute his behests.

On all sides you can hear the question asked, "If this can be done in Louisiana, and if such things be sustained by Congress, how long will it be before it can be done in Massachusetts and in Ohio? How long before the constitutional rights of all the States and the self-government of all the people may be trampled under foot? How long before a general of the Army may sit in the chair you occupy, sir, to decide contested-election cases for the purpose of manufacturing a majority in the Senate? How long before a soldier may stalk into the national House of Representatives, and, pointing to the Speaker's mace, say, 'take away that bauble!'"

* * * * * * *

The Federal office-holders in the South became the center of partisan intrigue and trickery. The Caseys and Packards carried off State senators in United States revenue-cutters and held republican conventions in United States custom-houses, guarded by United States soldiers to prevent other republican factions from interfering. Nay, more than that, Mr. Packard, during the last election campaign in Louisiana, being at the same time United States marshal and chairman of KELLOGG's campaign committee, managing not only the campaign, but also the movements of the United States dragoons, to enforce the laws and to keep his political opponents from "intimidating" his political friends. More than that, in one State after another in the South we saw enterprising politicians start rival Legislatures and rival governments, much in the way of Mexican pronunciamientos, calculating on the aid to be obtained from the National Government—the Attorney-General of the United States called upon to make or unmake governors of States by the mere wave of his hand, and the Department of Justice almost appearing like the central bureau for the regulation of State elections. And still more than that, we saw a Federal judge in Louisiana, by a midnight order, universally recognized as a gross and most unjustifiable usurpation, virtually making a State government and Legislature, and the National Executive with the Army sustaining that usurpation and Congress permitting it to be done.

And now the culminating glory to-day—I do not know whether it will be the culminating glory to-morrow: Federal soldiers, with fixed bayonets, marching into the legislative hall of a State, and invading the Legislature assembled in the place, and at the time fixed by law, dragging out of the body, by force, men universally recognized as claimants for membership, and having been seated; soldiers deciding contested-election cases and organizing a legislative body; the Lieutenant-General suggesting to the President to outlaw by proclamation a numerous class of people by the wholesale that he may try them by drum-head court-martial, and then the Secretary of War informing the Lieutenant-General by telegraph that "all of us," the whole Government, have full confidence in his judgment and wisdom. And, after all this, the whites of the South gradually driven to look upon the National Government as their implacable and unscrupulous enemy, and the people of the whole country full of alarm and anxiety about the safety of republican institutions and the rights of every man in the land.

He who in a place like ours fails to stop or even justifies a blow at the fundamental laws of the land makes himself the accomplice of those who strike at the life of the Republic and at the liberties of the people.

* * * * * * *

If you really think that the peace and order of society in this country can no longer be maintained through the self-government of the people under the Constitution and the impartial enforcement of constitutional laws; if you really think that this old machinery of free government can no longer be trusted with its most important functions, and that such transgressions on the part of those in power as now pass before us are right and necessary for the public welfare, then, gentlemen, admit that the Government of the people, for the people, and by the people is a miscarriage. Admit that the hundredth anniversary of this Republic must be the confession of its failure, and make up your minds to change the form as well as the nature of our institutions; for to play at republic longer would then be a cruel mockery. But I entreat you do not delude yourselves and others with the thought that by following the fatal road upon which we are now marching you can still preserve those institutions; for I tell you, and the history of struggling mankind bears me out, where the forms of constitutional government can be violated with impunity, there the spirit of constitutional government will soon be dead.

* * * * * * * *

But still more, the people have begun to understand, and it is indeed high time they should understand, that the means professedly used to prevent and suppress outrages are producing far worse fruit than the outrages themselves; that—and hear what I say—the lawlessness of power is becoming far more dangerous to all than the lawlessness of the mob.

The following opinion was given by Attorney-General Evarts, August 20, 1868, in response to a United States marshal:

While, however, the law gives you this "power to command all necessary assistance," and the military within your district are not exempt from obligation to obey in common with all the citizens, your summons, in case of necessity, you will be particular to observe that this high and responsible authority is given to the marshal only in aid of his duty "to execute throughout the district all lawful precepts directed to him and issued under the authority of the United States," and only in case of necessity for this extraordinary aid. The military persons obeying this summons of the marshal will act in subordination and obedience to the civil officer, the marshal, in whose aid in the execution of process they are called, and only to the effect of securing its execution.

The special duty and authority in the execution of process issued to you must not be confounded with the duty and authority of suppressing disorder and preserving the peace, which, under our Government, belongs to the civil authority of the States, and not to the civil authorities of the United States. Nor are this special duty and authority of the marshal in executing process issued to him to be confounded with the authority and duty of the President of the United States in the specific cases of the Constitution and under the statutes to protect the States against domestic violence, or with his authority and duty under special statutes to employ military force in subduing combinations in resistance to the laws of the United States; for neither of these duties or authorities is shared by the subordinate officers of the Government, except when and as the same may be specifically communicated to them by the President.

The public cannot have forgotten how General Sheridan in 1872, acting under orders from Washington, seized the Legislature of Louisiana, dispersed it, and installed a new body of men in its place, and then proposed to outlaw a large part of the population of that State and try them by drum-head court-martial as banditti. People cannot have forgotten the indignation very generally expressed at these high-handed proceedings.

HON. CARL SCHURZ.

In a speech Hon. Carl Schurz, now a member of Hayes's Cabinet, said, in his place in the Senate:

United States soldiers, with fixed bayonets, decided the case against them, and took them out of the legislative hall by force. * * * I cannot, therefore, escape from the deliberate conviction—a conviction conscientiously formed—that the deed done on the 4th of January, in the state-house of Louisiana, by the military forces of the United States, constitutes a gross and manifest violation of the Constitution and laws of this Republic. * * * If this can be done in Louisiana, and if such things be sustained by Congress, how long will it be before it can be done in Massachusetts and Ohio?

He who, in a place like ours, fails to stop, or even justifies a blow at the fundamental laws of the land, makes himself the accomplice of those who strike at the life of the Republic and at the liberties of the people.

In speaking on the same subject before the Cooper Institute indignation meeting, Mr. Evarts also entered his memorable protest against the military usurpation in Louisiana in the following language:

When men vote, and when their chosen officers meet, and when without violence and without demonstration of insurrection they undertake to conduct the affairs of their political government, no soldiers can interfere.

There are two very distinct, firm lines of limitation, which, observed, will protect the machinery of the Government for the people to-day—that is, that the sole intervention of the Federal power within State authority shall be to suppress violence, and that their office after that shall not assume to go further unless when invited by the supreme authority of the State.

What use is it to give the purse and the sword to the House of Commons if the King or the President by military power can determine what shall be the constitution of the House of Commons or the House of Congress? And that is what they fought for in England. * * * And for this reason the people of the United States are justified in assuming that the supreme civil power shall dominate over the military, and that no merging of them or interference with them shall be permitted.

OTHER AUTHORITY.

Let me quote on this subject from the first volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, page 178:

And as it is essential to the very being of Parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal and strongly prohibited. * * * As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove at least one day before the election to the distance of two miles or more; and not to return till one day after the election is ended.

This idea is fully recognized by elementary writers in this country. McCrary, in his American Law of Elections, at section 418, says:

There can, however, be no doubt but that the law looks with great disfavor upon anything like an interference by the military with the freedom of an election. An armed force in the neighborhood of the polls is almost of necessity a menace to the voters and an interference with their freedom and independence, and if such armed force be in the hands of or under the control of the partisan friends of any particular candidate, the probability of improper influence becomes still stronger.

McCrary cites this English case:

As early as 1741 an attempt was made to interfere with an election held for the city of Westminster, by stationing a body of armed soldiers near the polls. On this being shown to the House of Commons, it was by that body resolved that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom.

The high bailiff was taken into custody by order of the house, and the three magistrates who signed the order were brought to the bar and reprimanded by the speaker, upon their knees, as the house had directed; and after this the house passed a vote of thanks to the speaker for his reprimand of the delinquents, and directed the same to be printed.

Dr. Lieber, in his work on civil liberty and self-government, in speaking of elections, says:

It is especially necessary that the Army be in abeyance, as it were, with reference to all subjects and movements appertaining to the question at issue. The English law requires the removal of the garrison from every place where a common election for Parliament is going on. Much more necessary is the total neutrality of the Army in an election of the sort of which we now treat.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, under the title of the "freedom of elections," on page 614 says:

And with a just sense of the danger of military interference where a trust is to be exercised, the highest as well as the most delicate in the whole machinery of government, it has not been thought unwise to prohibit the militia being called out on election days, even though for no other purpose than for enrolling and organizing them.

The ordinary police is the peace force of the State, and its presence suggests order, individual safety, and public security; but when the militia appear upon the stage, even though composed of citizen militia, the circumstances must be assumed to be extraordinary, and there is always an appearance of threatening and dangerous compulsion which might easily interfere seriously with that calm and unimpassioned discharge of the elector's duty which the law so justly favors. The soldier in organized ranks can know no law but such as is given him by his commanding officer, and when he appears at the polls there is necessarily a suggestion of the presence of an enemy, against whom he may be compelled to exercise the most extreme and destructive force, and that enemy must generally be the party out of power, while the authority that commands the force directed against them will be the executive authority of the State for the time being wielded by their opponents.

General Grant, while General of the Army, in speaking of the use of the Army at the polls in the Southern States, said, in contradiction and condemnation of his subsequent conduct when President:

It is consequently of the highest importance that the presence of a military force at the polls be not suffered except in serious emergencies, when disorders exist or are threatened for the suppression or prevention of which the ordinary peace force is insufficient; and any statute which should provide for or permit such presence as an unusual occurrence or except in the last resort, though it might not be void, would nevertheless be a serious invasion of constitutional right and should not be submitted to in a free government without vigorous remonstrance.

And, lastly, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] referring to these election provisions, said at the close of the last session:

I am free to admit for one that these enactments were passed at a period so different from the present that probably we can without serious harm in any direction muster them out, as we mustered out of service the victorious armies when the war was done. For myself, I see no serious practical objection to letting these sections go, &c.

In a case in the courts in New York, quoted by Judge Cooley from 11 Johnston, 521, a subordinate officer brought his company out on the day of election simply for the purpose of enrolling and organizing, not to drill them, not to make any demonstration. He was sued for that, and he pleaded two matters; first, that it was merely for the purpose of enrolling; and, second, that he acted under the orders of his superior officers. The court held both pleas insufficient, and said:

Under the twenty-fifth section of the act to regulate elections, (sess. 36, c. 41,) no officer can order out any part of the militia during any election, or ten days previous thereto, even for the purpose of enrolling or organizing them, and not to exercise.

Merely for the purpose of putting their names on the books and organizing them and then sending them home; but the court said, "No, they had no business there." Their very appearance, in the language of Judge Cooley, suggested menace, gave suspicion of intimidation, which was not to be tolerated at a free election; and an election is not an election when it is not free.

Mr. William H. Seward, from his place in the Senate of the United States, in discussing the Kansas troubles in 1856, declared that—

The time was, and that not long ago, when a proposition to employ the standing Army of the United States as a domestic police would have been universally denounced as a premature revelation of a plot, darkly contrived in the chambers of conspiracy, to subvert the liberties of the people and to overthrow the Republic itself.

* * * * * * *

Civil liberty and a standing army for the purposes of civil police have never yet stood together, and never can stand together. If I am to choose, sir, between upholding laws in any part of this Republic which cannot be maintained without a standing army, or relinquishing the laws themselves, I give up the laws at once, by whomsoever they are made and by whatever authority; for either our system of government is radically wrong, or such laws are unjust, unequal, and pernicious.

* * * * * * *

If the founders of the Constitution had been told that within seventy years from the day on which they laid its solid foundations and raised its majestic columns a standing army would have been found necessary and indispensable merely to execute municipal laws, they would have turned shuddering away from the massive despotism which they had erected.

Captain O'Brien, (who distinguished himself as a soldier at Buena Vista, Mexico,) in his very able work on "American Military Law," in his chapter (2) on "restraints of executive," says:

Congress may declare when and for what objects the Army is to be used, and for what purposes it may not be used, and thus chart out accurately the limits of executive power. And even within these limits the action of the Executive, indirectly but absolutely, depends on the concurrence of Congress, which must appropriate funds for the purpose before even a corporal's guard can be moved.

LIBERAL REPUBLICAN OPINION.

The late Senator, Hon. Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, said on the 1st day of May, 1872, when he was elected president of a convention then being held, composed of the men who had been the republican leaders, of whom the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] was one, and which convention was participated in by such men as Mr. Trumbull, Mr. Sumner, Mr. Schurz, now Secretary of the Interior, and hundreds of others of the same distinguished character who could have held, and who up to that time had held, many of them, the highest offices of honor, profit, and trust in the gift of the republican party—Mr. Stanley Matthews, president of that convention, among other things said:

And now, gentlemen, one of the deep and earnest convictions, which has spread universally almost through the hearts of the American people and out of which this movement originates, is this, that the war of the rebellion is ended, and that peace has come, [applause,] and that, as the war has ended, so ought military rule and military principles, [cries of "Good!" "Good!" and loud cheers,] so ought everything that is arbitrary; so ought everything that degrades race or individuals; so ought everything that oppresses, everything that corrupts, everything that keeps alive and fans the embers of the dying and ought to be dead past. The cry came up four years ago, and it was thought to be an auspicious omen the coming of that time which we had looked for in vain, when it was said, "Let us have peace." Look at the South to-day. What a spectacle! We have the example of so-called civil governments bankrupting the communities they affect to represent; power usurped by strangers and not conferred by the voice of the people, and not for the purpose of restoring the prosperity of those battle-grazed fields, but for corruptly enriching the men who think that power and office belong to them as property and not as a trust. And so, gentlemen, in every department of the Government the slow poison of corruption, only not sufficiently slow, seems to have pervaded the whole civil and political administration of the country from the head to the foot. [Applause.]

Observe, that is the language of the late Senator from Ohio, then president of a convention of men who up to that time had been republicans, and who claimed that they were obliged to leave the republican party because of its military rule, because of its despotism, because of its disregard of the rights of States and people, because of its seeking to overthrow civil liberty, because of its consolidation, its centralization, and its despotic tendencies. They went further than that. They issued an address to the American people that no doubt was read all over Europe, if that is what Senators are afraid of, all over the world, and they said things in that address against the party which is now seeking to maintain military power, to keep the peace at the polls, in a manner more bitter than anything that any democrat ever said. It reads thus:

The administration now in power has rendered itself guilty of wanton disregard of the laws of the land, and of usurping powers not granted by the Constitution; it has acted as if the laws had binding force only for those who are governed, and not for those who govern. It has thus struck a blow at the fundamental principles of constitutional government and the liberties of the citizen.

The President of the United States has openly used the powers and opportunities of his high office for the promotion of personal ends.

He has kept notoriously corrupt and unworthy men in places of power and responsibility, to the detriment of the public interest.

He has used the public service of the Government as a machinery of corruption and personal influence, and has interfered, with tyrannical arrogance, in the political affairs of States and municipalities.

STATE LAWS AND CONSTITUTIONS.

NEW YORK.

If any officer or other person shall call out or order any of the militia of this State to appear and exercise on any day during any election to be held by virtue of this chapter, or within five days previous thereto, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, he shall forfeit the sum of $500 for every such offense.—Revised Statutes of New York State, chapter 6, title 7, section 5, page 448.

MAINE.

If any officer of the militia parades his men or exercises any military command on a day of election of a public officer, as described in section 102 of chapter 10 and not thereby excepted, or except in time of war or public danger, he shall for each offense forfeit not less than $10, nor more than $300.—Revised Statutes of Maine, chapter 4, section 65, page 104.

PENNSYLVANIA.

No body of troops in the Army of the United States, or of this Commonwealth, shall be present, either armed or unarmed, at any place of election within this Commonwealth during the time of such election: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officer or soldier from exercising the right of suffrage in the election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to law.—Brightley's Purdon's Digest, 1872; Pennsylvania; section 124, page 562.

NEW JERSEY.

No such election shall be appointed to be held on any day on which the militia of this State shall be required to do military duty, nor shall the militia of this State be required to do military duty on any day on which any such election shall be appointed to be held.—Nixon's Digest: New Jersey, revision of 1871; an act to regulate elections; section 33, page 262.

ILLINOIS.

Electors shall in all cases, except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at elections, and in going to and returning from the same, and no elector shall be obliged to do military duty on the days of election, except in time of war or public danger.—Revised Statutes Illinois, 1874, Constitution 1870, article 7, section 3.

MASSACHUSETTS.

No meeting for the election of national, State, district, county, city, or town officers shall be held on a day upon which the militia of the Commonwealth are by law required to do military duty.—General Statutes of Massachusetts, 1860, section 1, page 58.

The constitution of New York contains this provision, quoted by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN:]

All elections ought to be free; and no person, by force of arms, malice, menacing, or otherwise, shall presume to disturb or hinder any citizen of this State in the free exercise of the right of suffrage.

And the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] says:

In the early constitution of that little Commonwealth which it is my pride and honor partly to represent on this floor, I find this doctrine plainly given, in no jealousy of the power of the Government, but in jealousy of liberty when endangered in any quarter. The constitution of 1776 provided in article 28:

"ART. 28. To prevent any violence or force being used at the said elections no persons shall come armed to any of them, and no muster of the militia shall be made on that day; nor shall any battalion or company give in their votes immediately succeeding each other, if any other voter, who offers to vote, objects thereto, nor shall any battalion or company, in the pay of the continent, or of this or any other State, be suffered to remain at the time and place of holding the said elections, nor within one mile of the said places respectively, for twenty-four hours before the opening of said elections, nor within twenty-four hours after the same are closed, so as in any manner to impede the freely and conveniently carrying on the said election: Provided, always, That every elector may, in a peaceable and orderly manner, give in his vote on the said day of election."

Such, sir, was the exhibition of feeling of that early day; and shall it be said that we have retrograded? Shall we own that where the power has so infinitely increased that may threaten us, our anxieties or our duties have been lessened in a converse proportion? Go back, sir, into the pure and wholesome air of the earlier history of the State of New Jersey and read from the records of her colonial struggle to secure civil liberty, as related the other day by the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] The history of American government in all the charters and constitutions of the States is marked by the design to perpetuate liberty by means of free and constantly recurring elections; and in the light of such a record of every State and of the Government of the United States, I hold that the law of any State or of the United States that authorizes the presence of the armed forces of a State or of the United States—any armed force—I care not what, at the polls of a popular election, is a law leveled at free government, it is a blow at freedom itself; it is impossible for it to have any other object or result; and if there be those who shall be so blind as to believe that force at election and freedom can exist together they will awaken soon to a sad realization of their mistake.

THE MAILED HAND SINCE THE WAR.

We may judge the future by the past. If we find that those intrusted with power use it to destroy or attack free institutions it is a proof that it will be done again. Let us take the history of the country since Grant came to power and see how the Federal Army has again and again been used to strike down or threaten free men and free institutions, to dominate Legislatures and threaten voters.

See, first, New York at the congressional election of 1870:

[Official.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, October 27, 1870.

SIR: In view of the apprehension that there may be possible opposition made to the United States laws in connection with the coming election in the city of New York, November 8, 1870, the President directs that you instruct Brigadier-General McDowell, commanding the Department of the East, to hold the troops in that vicinity in readiness for service during a week, if necessary, to protect and assist the civil officers of the United States in their duty of enforcing the laws. The engineer troops and all others in the harbor of New York and vicinity will, for the occasion, be at his command. You will instruct General McDowell to confer fully beforehand with the United States marshal and the United States district attorney, to concert with them proper measures, and to promptly respond to any call made upon him for troops by the marshal during the week of the election, ordering them in such numbers and to such points in the city as the marshal may signify.

The President hopes that the use of the United States troops for the purpose indicated will never be required, but the law must be enforced, and he therefore expects General McDowell and the officers and troops under his command, while using the utmost discretion, to take care that the purpose of the Government to enforce the law is fully carried out; but in the performance of this duty they are only effectually to execute the measures indicated to them by the authorized civil officers of the United States.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.
CHAUNCEY McKEEVER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

General W. T. SHERMAN,
United States Army, Washington, D. C.

[Special Orders No. 229.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST,
New York City, November 5, 1870.

1. The available officers and two hundred non-commissioned officers and privates of the engineer troops at Willett's Point, New York Harbor, will come to the headquarters building in this city, on next Monday evening, November 7, so as to arrive by ten o'clock p. m., prepared for armed service, and to remain at least till Wednesday morning. They will come in a steamboat, which the quartermaster's department will send for them, and will be landed at the foot of Spring street, (Pier No. 43 North River,) and march thence and take the station which may be shown them by the district quartermaster. They will bring a day's cooked rations. Facilities will be afforded in the building for making hot coffee.

2. All the available officers and men of the Eighth Infantry will be brought to the city on Monday, the 7th instant, to arrive about ten o'clock p. m. They will come prepared for armed service, with their overcoats and blankets, to remain at least till Wednesday morning, the 9th instant. The colonel, with five companies, will take post in building No. 161 Avenue B, near the northeast corner of Tompkins square, and the lieutenant-colonel, with five companies, will take post in buildings Nos. 322, 324, and 326 East Forty-fifth street, between First and Second avenues.

3. The available officers and men of the companies of the First Artillery at Forts Hamilton, Wadsworth, and Wood, under Colonel Vogdes or the senior officer, will come to the city on Monday evening, the 7th instant, to arrive by about ten p. m., prepared for armed service, and to remain at least till Wednesday morning. They will take post in building No. 294 Broadway, near the corner of Reade street, and will land at the wharf most convenient for their reaching that point. They will bring with them a day's cooked rations and their camp-kettles for making coffee. The district quartermaster will furnish drays to carry their effects from the steamboat.

4. The troops above indicated, and the Fifth Artillery from Fort Trumbull and Fort Adams, are to be brought here to aid the United States civil officers in the execution of their duty in enforcing the United States laws; and it cannot be too strongly impressed on them that the duty they have to perform is one of exceeding delicacy and of the highest importance, and that it may depend largely on their fidelity and good conduct that peace is maintained. They will be held in readiness for service at literally a moment's notice; and from the time of their arrival not a man will be allowed to leave the building on any account, or for any purpose whatever, unless under a commissioned officer.

5. Commanders of the stations above named will, immediately on their arrival, send a report of the fact to department headquarters.

By command of Brigadier-General McDowell.

ROBERT C. PERRY,
Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

The troops came on Monday night—and disembarked silently to their several quarters. During the day perfect order reigned. The headquarters of the department, at the corner of Houston and Greene streets, presented a quiet appearance. The stairways, however, leading to the two upper stories of the building were packed with troops. The engineer department from Willett's Point, numbering three hundred men, with Companies H and I of the Fifth United States Artillery from Fort Trumbull, New London, Connecticut, all under command of Colonel Kiddoe, were quartered in the halls and on the stairs. Their arms were stacked, and the men were scattered around on benches and on the floor, or stood in groups engaged in conversation. All were armed with the latest improved needle-gun and furnished with forty rounds of ammunition, with one hundred rounds a man in reserve.

As they were ordered, says the New York Tribune, November 9, 1870—

At pier No. 27, North River, Companies A, B, and L, of the Fifth United States Artillery, from Fort Adams, Newport, were quartered on the steamer Metis In addition to these was Dupont's Light Battery of four guns. None was allowed to leave the boat or to enter without a pass. The men were in the lower part of the boat and the officers were in the cabin, under Colonel Hunt.

Companies B, C, D, H, and M, of the First United States Artillery, Colonel Vogdes, from Forts Hamilton and Wadsworth, New York Harbor, were stationed in the three upper stories of No. 294 Broadway.

At No. 161 Avenue B, near Tompkins square, there were stationed the first five companies of the Eighth Infantry, Colonel Bomford in command. This regiment came from David's Island, and was armed with the needle-gun. They were quartered in the hall over a lager-beer saloon, and Company A was kept under arms ready for marching orders. The remaining five companies of the regiment were on Forty-fifth street, between First and Second avenues, in the large room of a brewery. Guards were, as in all cases, stationed at the top and bottom of the stairs, and all who applied for entrance were taken under guard before Colonel Edie. Long rows of stacked arms extended the whole length of the hall. An ample supply of ammunition was brought to the place, amounting in the aggregate to one hundred and forty rounds for each man.

And then it seems that the then Secretary of the Navy, Mr. ROBESON, lent his ready aid:

In the river and harbor, the frigates Guerriere and Narragansett were at anchor at the foot of Chambers street, North River, and Wall street, East River, respectively. The port-holes were all closed, however, and every appearance of warlike preparation on board was avoided. None other than the troops regularly stationed there were on Governor's Island.

The governor of New York, Governor Hoffman, addressed his Legislature on this subject. He said:

Since the adjournment of the Legislature the Federal Government has assumed to interfere directly, by its officers and armed forces, with elections in this State. The pretext was fear that the right of suffrage would, in some way, be denied to the class of persons upon whom it had been conferred by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. It was a mere pretext; for our State Legislature at its last session promptly altered our election laws to conform with that amendment so soon as it was declared adopted. Moreover, this class of voters had exercised their new right freely and without the least molestation at our State election, which took place in May last.

Congress, nevertheless, enacted a law for the ostensible purpose of supervising the election of Congressmen only; and the President was authorized to employ the Army and Navy to enforce certain of its provisions. Under color of this act, the President and other United States officials claimed the right to supervise the entire election, not only for Representatives in Congress, but for State and local officers. In the city of New York special preparations were made to enforce this claim. A large number of United States deputy marshals and supervisors were appointed, many of whom were men of well-known disreputable character, and some of whom had been convicted criminals; a class of dangerous men never before chosen by any ruling authority, in any community, as conservators of the peace. They were instructed, under advice of the Attorney-General of the United States, to submit to no interference from any quarter under State or municipal authority. Orders were issued which authorized them, in the discretion of each one of them, to arrest at the polls citizens claiming the right to vote, as well as the inspectors who were charged by law with the custody of the ballot-boxes. These arrests were to be effected without process of law issued upon formal complaints.

Then telling what steps he had taken with the best organized regiments of New York to guard all the rights of every citizen, he said:

Notwithstanding all this, by the President's orders, United States troops were brought from distant posts and quartered in the city of New York, and ships of war were anchored in its harbor. It was certainly not unreasonable to expect that the first drop of citizen's blood shed in the city of New York by Federal troops, in time of peace, might lead to terrible results, involving great loss of life and incalculable destruction of property.

* * * * * * *

At the last moment, that is to say, the afternoon immediately before the election, the officers of the United States, fortunately and wisely, abandoned the extreme ground they had taken, and entered into a stipulation with the local authorities of New York City in my presence, which resulted in preventing any armed interference by troops, either of the United States or of the State.

Governor Hoffman closes his message thus:

To depend for the peace and order of localities on the Federal Army is not self-government; to substitute the regular soldier with his musket as a peace officer in place of the constable with his writ is not to preserve the peace but to establish the condition of war; to surrender elections to the control of the President supported by armed forces is to surrender liberty and to abandon a republic.

PENNSYLVANIA.

At the election in 1869 for governor of Pennsylvania, in the third precinct of the Fifth ward of the city of Philadelphia, an armed body of marines were brought to the polls. They took possession thereof and closed and kept them closed for an hour until they saw fit to open them and permit those to vote whom they thought ought to vote.

Governor Geary, republican governor of Pennsylvania, a major-general in the Army, in his message to the Legislature in January, 1871, said:

The employment of United States troops at elections, without the consent of the local and State governments, has recently received considerable attention and reprehension. It is regarded as an interference with the sovereign rights of the States which was not contemplated by the founders of the General Government, and if persisted in must lead to results disastrous to peace and harmony. The practice is one so serious in its character and so injurious in its tendencies as to merit prompt consideration and decisive action, not only by the General Assembly but by Congress. One of the complaints of the colonists against the British King was the oppression growing out of the assumption of this power. They said, "He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies without the consent of our legislature;" and what is especially pertinent to the case in point, "He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power." The alleged authority for the use of troops at our State elections is derived from the tenth section of an act of Congress, approved May 31, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes," which authorizes United States marshals to call to their assistance "such portion of the land and naval forces of the United States or of the militia as may be necessary to the performance of the duty with which they are charged, and to insure a faithful observance of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States." But it must be a forced construction of this law that will justify the presence of armed national forces at our places of election when no necessity exists therefor, and where their presence is calculated to provoke collision. With a good President the exercise of the power referred to might have no injurious results, but in the hands of a bad man governed by personal ambition it might prove exceedingly calamitous. Unconsciously a good President might be induced to employ it wrongfully; a bad would be almost certain to use it for his own advancement. Under any circumstances, in my opinion, it is unsafe and antagonistic to the principles that should govern our republican institutions. At the last October election United States troops were stationed in Philadelphia for the avowed purpose of enforcing the election laws. This was done without the consent or even the knowledge of the civil authorities of either the city or the State, and without any expressed desire on the part of the citizens and as far as can be ascertained without existing necessity. From a conscientious conviction of its importance I have called your attention to this subject. A neglect to have done so might have been construed as an indorsement of a measure that meets my unqualified disapproval. The civil authorities of Pennsylvania have always been and are still competent to protect its citizens in the exercise of their elective franchise, and the proper and only time for the United States military forces to intervene would be when the power of the Commonwealth is exhausted and their aid is lawfully required.

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.

I read now from Brightly's Election Cases, page 605, in note:

Perhaps there is no better proof of the extent to which the principles of civil and political liberty have passed from the remembrance of the American people than the fact recorded in the daily newspapers, without comment, that at the municipal election of the city of Charleston, held on the 2d August, 1871, six years after the close of the civil war, a body of Federal troops was stationed at each precinct, to prevent violence. And this without shadow of authority and without its exciting the slightest emotion in the citizens of what is claimed to be a free country.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Judge Thomas J. Mackey thus describes what he saw at the November election in 1876 at the polls of the town in which he resides:

I was called upon on the 7th day of November, 1876, while the general election was being held in the State for State officers, members of the Legislature, members of Congress, and presidential electors, to interpose my official authority to check the interference of the military and deputy marshals with the voters. On the afternoon before the election there arrived in Chester a detachment of about forty men of the Eighteenth Infantry, United States Army, and coincident with their arrival a number of persons, numbering twenty-nine or thirty, appeared at the military encampment, about four hundred yards off.

These persons who claimed to be deputy marshals wore badges designating them as deputy marshals. They were headed by one James Canton, a white man, from Columbia, South Carolina. Several of them openly proclaimed in my hearing their purpose to carry the election, and exhibited a printed circular purporting to have been signed by the Attorney-General of the United States, Attorney-General Taft, directed to the marshals in the several States.

* * * * * * *

Isaac Cassels fled to the military encampment of a detachment of the Eighteenth Infantry, then posted within the vicinity of the Kearney-Hill precinct. The officer at first refused to surrender him, but on his attention being called to the fifty-third article of war in the Revised Articles of War of June, 1874, providing that an officer resisting the execution of process issued by the judge of any State court should be court-martialed and on conviction cashiered, he surrendered Isaac Cassels on the warrant. That included four of the deputy marshals who were placed on trial. They alleged that they acted in the due exercise of their official powers. It was held that there was no authority for appointing a deputy special marshal beyond the limits of a city having a population of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward. Three of them were acquitted. Isaac Cassels was convicted and sentenced to a term of three months' imprisonment in the county jail, the lowest penalty prescribed by law. The next morning the polls were opened at six, and at about seven o'clock several citizens called on me and complained that they were being intimidated in the exercise of the elective franchise, one of them a colored man with his head bleeding; he had been stricken down by a deputy marshal. He was remitted to a trial-justice, the committing magistrate, to make his complaint. The magistrate issued warrants embracing sixteen deputy marshals charged with intimidating voters. I countersigned those warrants on being informed by the sheriff that these parties had fled to the military encampment. Four of them were arrested upon these warrants and brought before me, and were sent to the justice who had issued the warrants Their preliminary examination was had there. They were bound over to answer in the court of general sessions, under our statute for intimidating voters, which was to assemble in February, 1877. At two o'clock in the day complaint was lodged before me that the chief deputy marshal of the county, Isaac Cassels, had, at the head of a band of colored republicans, assaulted colored voters at Kearney Hill precinct, Chester county, tearing from their hands the Hayes and Hampton ticket; several of these voters refusing to surrender their tickets had been knocked down by Isaac Cassels and those associated with him. The trial-justice being reported ill, I issued the warrant in that case myself At about the time I issued the warrant for Isaac Cassels, I learned that the military had taken possession of the poll. I was then standing at a distance of two hundred yards from the poll conversing with a gentleman when this information was given me. I looked out, saw the military just marching into the court-house yard. The polls were opened in the court-house; there were two polls, one above and one below. I passed on to the vicinity of the court-house and saw that a detachment of the Eighteenth Infantry, numbering nineteen men, under Lieutenant Hinton, had formed in two lines, their right resting at a point within thirty feet of the poll, and voters in passing to the poll were required to pass between these two lines of soldiers with fixed bayonets.

Several of the deputy marshals were engaged in distributing tickets, and charged the colored persons having democratic tickets in their hands and in a line with the whites with betraying their race. All the deputy marshals, with one exception, were colored men. Their instructions were signed by the United States marshal, the words at the head of their commissions being "Stand by your party." The witnesses saw in three or four instances democratic ballots destroyed by these officers.

VIRGINIA.

It is said also by a leading gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER:]

I have myself seen a subaltern of the Army enter a court of justice in Virginia and deliver a military order to the judge upon the bench to enter a judgment in favor of a party to a case on his docket. I had myself, as a commissioner of the court to sell land, been ordered by the military to refrain from doing so, which order I refused to obey, and learned that for a public avowal in court of such refusal I was threatened with court-martial.

Mr. GARFIELD. In what year was that?

Mr. TUCKER. It was about the year 1868.

The troops sent to control the election of November 7, 1876, at Petersburgh, Virginia, efficiently performed the work of intimidation. A ballot protected by Federal troops is advocated by General Grant in his special message of December 14, 1876, (Executive Document No. 5, Senate, second session Forty-fourth Congress,) thus:

These inclosures will give all the information called for by the resolution, and I confidently believe will justify the action taken. It is well understood that the presence of United States troops at polling places never prevented the free exercise of the franchise by any citizen, of whatever political faith. If, then, they have had any effect whatever upon the ballot cast, it has been to insure protection to the citizen casting it in giving it to the candidate of his unbiased choice without fear, and thus securing the very essence of liberty. It may be the presence of twenty-four United States soldiers under the command of a captain and lieutenant, quartered in the custom-house at Petersburgh, Virginia, on the 7th of November, at a considerable distance from any polling place, without any interference on their part whatever, and without going near the polls during the election, may have secured a different result from what would have been obtained if they had not been there (to maintain the peace in case of riot) on the face of the returns. But if such is the case, it is only proof that in this one congressional district in the State of Virginia the legal and constitutional voters have been able to return as elected the candidates of their choice.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, December 14, 1876.

ORDER OF GENERAL SHERMAN, DATED DECEMBER 11, 1876.

To a more complete understanding of the case, I will add that on the 2d of November a gentleman came to me from the Attorney-General, representing that there was reason to apprehend a breach of the peace at Petersburgh, Virginia, and asking a detachment of troops to be sent there. You being then absent, I saw Judge Taft in person, and he advised that a company of soldiers be sent to Petersburgh, if practicable; and the next day, being in New York City, I saw General Hancock in person, and, after some inquiries as to the troops available, I ordered him to send the above-designated company to Petersburgh, to remain during the election of November 7, and then return to its post.

I inclose a copy of his orders; also copies of General Orders Nos. 85 and 96, which include all the orders and instructions made to troops serving in districts where disturbances were apprehended.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

Hon. J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] from his place here, on the 16th of January, 1877, thus described that outrage:

There was no power in the first place to appoint the "special deputies" in Petersburgh, and they were not appointed for the purposes contemplated by the law, but to secure a republican majority. They did their duties in no respect. They were not needed to keep the peace, for there was no intention of violating it. How the "special deputies" thus illegally appointed in Petersburgh acted on the day of election I learn from good authority. There are about twenty-five hundred colored voters in that city. They were all listed and a captain assigned to each ten voters, who was responsible for the votes of his squad. To each of these captains, of whom there were about two hundred and fifty, a commission in the Grand Army of the Republic was issued. Commissions as United States deputy marshals were given to each of them, thus constituting them United States officers and giving them the authority of the Government over the ignorant and credulous negroes. On election day each captain marched his squad to the United States custom-house, where the troops were, and there a Hayes and Wheeler ticket was issued to each man. They were then sworn to vote the ticket so received, and the squad was marched to the polls under the escort and superintendence of a man wearing the badge and having the power of a United States marshal.

And this was the purpose for which special deputy marshals were appointed in Petersburgh, and this was the way in which they "kept the peace, protected the supervisors, prevented fraudulent voting," &c.

But this was not all. Instead of aiding and supporting the officers of election, as it was their duty to do, these special deputies openly defied them, and at two polling places, twice during the day of the election, it was necessary to apply to Judge Hughes to have them ejected from the interior of the voting places, where only by law the State conductors, judges, and the United States supervisors were allowed. In the First ward the negroes were found in solid column, two or three hundred deep, to the exclusion of the white voters, and when the judges, to meet this unfairness, opened two avenues of approach, and proceeded to allow the whites and blacks to vote alternately, the assistant district attorney notified the mayor that unless the column of whites were made to fall into the rear of the blacks he would disperse it by force. Rather than see this done the whites left their places and went into the rear of the blacks, and for hours none of them could get to give in their ballots. But this was still not all, for the negroes, after voting, instead of leaving the way open, went back and fell into the column again in order to keep the whites away if possible. And of this trick the marshal, whose duty it was to see that all were allowed to vote, afterward openly boasted. At one ward after the voting was over the negroes to the number of several hundred formed around the voting place and swore aloud if that poll was against them that they would murder the white men, rather than the box should be carried to the central depot. Yet neither soldier, nor marshal, nor special deputy marshal, nor district attorney, nor district judge, appeared to prevent the execution of this threat or to keep the peace.

LOUISIANA AND GEORGIA.

I quote history from the speech of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK:]

Sir, I have seen, we all have seen in the last ten years, the State of Georgia, after she had representatives on the floor of Congress, her representative men sitting in these Halls voting for or against laws to bind the people of the United States, invaded by a Federal Army by orders from Washington, and nineteen duly elected democrats turned out of her legislative halls and others put in their place. We have seen a railway employé set up by Federal bayonets as speaker of her house of representatives, and the great State of Georgia crushed to the earth by military authority of the United States. We have seen the State of Louisiana seized, her Legislature dispersed, her State-house held by Federal soldiers under pretended judgments of United States courts, and United States marshals ordered by the President, or their action at least indorsed by all of the authorities at Washington over and over again in taking control of the Army of the United States and using it for the basest of purposes until a committee of this House, four of them uniting in the report and the others only refusing to unite because the views of the four constituting the majority were not strong enough, denouncing the military interference in the strongest and boldest terms; they were, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] the then Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Alcorn,] and the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] all declaring that there was no pretense of authority for Judge Durell or those acting under him, or for Marshal Packard or the authority that he called in to intervene, which was the United States Army that was brought from Florida and elsewhere to take possession of the state-house of Louisiana. Judge Trumbull, of Illinois, Mr. Morton, of Indiana, the other two members, laid before the Senate their own views in which they were equally emphatic, and perhaps more so. Judge Trumbull used this language—Attorney-General George H. Williams had telegraphed Marshal Packard, under whom the military were placed on the same level as the common spies, informers, and detectives:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana.

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, in his report states how this was done:

This dispatch, so far as the evidence shows, was not responsive to any call for troops; there had been no resistance to any process of the United States courts, nor does it appear that any was threatened. R. H. Jackson, a captain in the First Artillery, United States Army, testified that he went to New Orleans on the night of December 5 with two batteries of his regiment and eighty-six men.

The same night, December 5, between nine and eleven o'clock, Judge Durell, at his private lodgings, issued his order which, for want of jurisdiction, was void, and entitled to no respect from anybody, directing the United States marshal forthwith to take possession of the State-house, to hold the same until the further order of the court, and prevent all unlawful assemblage of persons therein, having reference to the persons returned as elected to the Legislature according to the official returns. Captain Jackson testifies that he took possession of the state-house at about two o'clock on the morning of the 6th, with instructions to take and hold it under the direction of the United States marshal and to act in obedience to his orders. He further testified that he was not stationed in the state-house to prevent riots, but to hold the building, and that if a riot had occurred in front of the building he would not have interfered. He posted two soldiers at the entrance door, who guarded it with crossed bayonets, and suffered no one to enter the building except by permission of the United States marshal, one of whose deputies was at all times present. These troops continued to occupy the state-house for more than six weeks, until January 21, and it is manifest, from the whole testimony, that they were not there to preserve the peace, but to carry out the illegal orders of Judge Durell, and prevent the legally elected members of the Legislature from assembling and organizing.

WEST VIRGINIA.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] says:

I hold in my hand the order of "J. D. CAMERON, Secretary of War, by command of General Sherman," when it was determined that Louisiana should be carried by force or fraud or in any other way in 1876. This order was issued, taking advantage of a House resolution which had been passed saying that the courts and the authorities of the various States should punish crimes wherever they found them. Acting upon what he called the spirit of that resolution, and without a call from the Legislatures or governors of any of the States, in plain, palpable violation of the Constitution of the United States, the order proceeds:

"The President directs that, in accordance with the spirit of the above, you are to hold all the available force under your command (not now engaged in subduing the savages of the western frontier) in readiness to be used, upon the call or requisition of the proper legal authorities, for protecting all citizens, without distinction of race, color, or political opinion, in the exercise of the right to vote as guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment; and to assist in the enforcement of 'certain, condign, and effectual punishment' upon all persons who shall 'attempt, by force, fraud, terror, intimidation, or otherwise, to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage,' as provided by the laws of the United States, and have such force so distributed and stationed as to be able to render prompt assistance in the enforcement of the law.

"Such additional orders as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of these instructions will be given to you from time to time, after consultation with the law officers of the Government."

Under that order forty-five hundred soldiers were at once started from the West to those States to take possession of them, and an order was issued to them to obey whatever the marshals or any of the other (so called) authorities placed there for partisan purposes should put upon them. The result is known.

Mr. HEREFORD. Prior to the time that the State of West Virginia passed from under the control of the republican party we always had the military there, and I have seen them at the polls making arrests on the day of voting in my own town.

Mr. BLAINE. When?

Mr. HEREFORD. When?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, when did you ever see a military man in the uniform of the United States making arrests at the polls?

Mr. HEREFORD. I have known of them make arrests in Mercer County.

Mr. BLAINE. When?

Mr. HEREFORD. If you stop a moment, I can look back and think.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to know when?

Mr. HEREFORD. In 1870, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Ten years ago?

Mr. HEREFORD. About that.

Mr. BLAINE. Or before that?

Mr. HEREFORD. It was after the war. I saw this: we had a company of soldiers stationed in the town where I lived within one hundred steps of the voting place, and that company on the day of election were divided up, a part of them sent to an adjoining county, the county of Mercer, where they expected to control the voters.

Mr. BLAINE. One company!

Mr. HEREFORD. And were placed there within seventy yards of the place of voting

Mr. BLAINE. What did they arrest anybody for?

Mr. HEREFORD. For the purpose of intimidation.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, yes!

Mr. HEREFORD. For the purpose of intimidation.

THE CRIME AGAINST LIBERTY.

Mr. ELLIS, a gentleman from Louisiana, says:

When interrupted by the gentleman from Maine I was about to recount to this House some scenes that have transpired in my own State, some of which I saw, and others of which I know to be true; scenes the recounting of which will bring a blush to the patriot's cheek; scenes which too often repeated have made the pages of the history of our country for the past eleven years dark and shameful pages. In 1867 I saw States blotted out of the Union and "military districts," ruled by soldiers, created on their ruins. I saw troops conducting the registration of voters and stationed at all the polling places. I saw test oaths, infamous in their conception and ruinous in their effects, applied to the body of the citizens, in order that the virtue and wealth and intelligence of the Southern States might have no controlling voice in the elections. Let me cite one instance. An old man who had no part in the war, venerable in years, of the purest and most exalted Christian character, who had been for forty years a minister of the gospel of our holy religion, and was still one, though for a long time physically unable to preach, went to the registration office and asked to be registered. He was bowed with the weight of more than fourscore years. The question was asked him: "Were you in the confederate army?" "No," he answered. "Have you extended aid in any manner to the confederate cause?" Again he responded he had not. Again he was asked "Have you preached sermons advising secession and sustaining the rebellion?" and he responded that it had been long since his voice had been heard in the pulpit, and that he had never preached political sermons; "but," said he, "sometimes during the war, in the midst of their great sorrows, I prayed for my people." The soldier who was conducting the registration told him "stand aside, sir. You cannot register or vote"

In 1872 I saw the legally elected government of my State overthrown by bayonets. A company of United States troops marched to the state-house under the order of a drunken Federal judge, issued at midnight under cover of the very laws we now seek to repeal, and seized the building; and I saw Federal bayonets crossed above the entrance to the state-house, sentinels on guard all around it and pacing up and down its corridors. If a representative of the people was able to produce a pass to the legislative hall signed by the United States marshal he was admitted, but those who possessed not that "shibboleth" were denied admittance and ordered away.

In 1874 I saw a United States marshal in charge of United States troops, with his pockets full of blank warrants of arrests, raiding the whole northern section of my State. Citizens guilty of no crime, against whom there was neither charge nor suspicion, were arrested at midnight and dragged from their homes and families for political effect, and for no other reason than that they dared to be democrats and to attempt through the peaceful agency of the ballot-box the overthrow of the infamous political party which was ruling and ruining the State. Writs of habeas corpus, legally issued to restrain these outrages and release the injured and outraged citizens, were returned to the civil officers, who attempted to serve them, with epithets that would have befitted the mouth of a harridan of the "fish market," and with a message to the honored judge who issued the writs too foul and indecent to pass the lips of a gentleman.

In 1875 I saw the legally elected legislators of my State peaceably assembled in the state-house in legal and constitutional session. The body had elected their speaker and their officers, and was proceeding with the discharge of their duties, when a regiment of United States troops with fixed bayonets surrounded the state-house. A detachment of those troops, commanded by a colonel and brevet brigadier-general of the Federal Army, entered the legislative hall and by force arrested and ejected from the hall five members of the Legislature legally elected, and thrust in and seated in their places five men who had been beaten at the polls.

Again, in 1876, under color of this law the troops were invoked both in Louisiana and South Carolina for no other purpose than to carry the elections, and that their presence did unquestionably carry the election for the republican candidates in South Carolina there is not a shadow of a doubt. In that same year, under color of this supervisors statute which we seek to repeal, I saw ten thousand men arrested in the city of New Orleans by United States marshals only five or six days before the election. Yes, arrested by virtue of these very statutes in which the gentleman from New York finds no harm, under which he solemnly declares no citizens have suffered grievance, and yet by these arrests we estimate that between two and three thousand citizens in the city of New Orleans were deprived of their right to vote. In connection with this latter statement I beg to read from the great argument of that distinguished and able jurist, Judge John A. Campbell, formerly of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered before the electoral commission. Said he:

"I can tell you another fact. I can tell you a fact more startling than any fact which has been reported here and which may serve at the next election for the campaign speeches of that time. On the 30th day of October there issued out of the circuit court of the United States at New Orleans ten thousand and more of warrants of arrest, to seize ten thousand distinct individuals, inhabitants of the city of New Orleans, for having falsely registered themselves in 1874 as competent voters. They embraced many of the most respectable men in the city, my friend and family physician and one of our Representatives in Congress among the number of those arrested for false registration."

Yes, sir, I am the Representative in Congress who was one of those arrested for having fraudulently registered myself as a voter. I had lived in that city for many years and am a native of the State; my residence was upon one of the principal streets of the city; my law office was within four blocks of the court-house from which issued these warrants; I was in the midst of my campaign, speaking every day and night, and the daily papers contained notices of my movements and speeches; and yet, sir, under color of these most infamous laws I and ten thousand of my fellow-citizens, as good, as free, as honest, and as guiltless as I, were arrested and compelled to stand trial before a United States commissioner. Ten thousand men arrested before one commissioner five days before an election, deprived of the right to vote unless we could have trial and be acquitted; a physical impossibility almost that all of us could be tried within that time. Here, Mr. Chairman, was one of the most daring, infamous, flagrant outrages upon the rights and liberties of citizens, perpetrated in the interest and at the behest of the republican party, and yet that party declares that we shall not repeal those laws, and distinguished representatives of that party assert that no grievance has been suffered under them; that the question of their repeal is a mere question of sentiment, and that there is nothing real in our complaints against their execution.

But Judge Campbell continues:

"Never was such a picture of any community as that. There were ten thousand lies sworn to in order to procure those warrants. There was not a scintilla of proof nor any desire to have any proof. Thirteen hundred and sixty cases were tried and dismissed; but it effected the purpose. The affidavits were all made by two men, policemen, both of them. I have read a portion of the affidavits myself piled up in the court-house, covering a table so high."

Citizens arrested upon the affidavits of perjured partisans under color of this law, and yet we are told that no man has suffered grievance by its execution. Three thousand citizens deprived of their right to vote, and yet we are coolly told by the party who perpetrated this outrage that the laws must stand in order that the "ballot may be safe" and the "elections pure."

POTTER COMMITTEE REPORT.

The Committee on Alleged Frauds in the late Presidential Election say that when the Army is brought in as a factor to prevent frauds it may be used by those who desire to commit frauds. I read what the majority of the committee—and I read this to illustrate, I do not want to argue the question—find as facts. They say:

In Florida the board of State canvassers usurped discretionary powers and reversed the result of the votes cast. They did this in the presence of certain visiting statesmen sent there by the President of the United States and surrounded by Federal troops.

The same is found as to Louisiana. The canvassing or returning board were encouraged by powerful politicians of the dominant party; they were supported in the exercise of this power. I will now read as to how they did in Louisiana:

On the other hand, the election in Louisiana was determined by a partisan returning board, exercising discretionary revisory power over the votes cast. This power was unauthorized; but even if authorized the board flagrantly and outrageously abused it. They were supported in its exercise by visiting statesmen, sent also by the President to Louisiana. They were surrounded while engaged in it by Federal troops.

When corruption undermines this Government it will be when partisan men have control of the Army and Navy and use them to protect the timid who, devoid of honor and of conscience, will for patronage or pay falsify the canvass or the count to defeat the will of the electors. Was there ever such a fraud as this perpetrated without there being power to protect those who did it? What does the minority of the committee say in their report at page 89? The Army was there:

But it appears that two of the electors were absent and their names were signed by some other person.

A forgery of the very names of the electors! The Army was there surrounding the state-house. What does General Butler say about it? The Army was there protecting them all. General Butler, who made an independent report, says—

That if any legal election was held in Louisiana, then the majority of the votes actually cast in the State were for the Tilden electors and for Governor Nicholls.

He expresses in his report the opinion that the votes of Louisiana should not have been counted for either party, but he says—

That the counting in of Mr. Hayes was obtained by a series of gross and unjustifiable irregularities and frauds, which cannot be too strongly condemned and reprobated.

Yet there was no mob; there was no violence. These boards were surrounded by those who had control of the United States troops when these gross frauds and forgeries were perpetrated in reference to a presidential election, but for which the result of the election would have been the other way, according to this evidence and according to these reports of the majority and General Butler. I observe in this report that the majority of the committee say, in reference to the use of troops, what expresses my idea better than my own language. They say in their elaborate report, page 64:

Nor can the danger of interfering in local elections by Federal troops, whether to protect officials in the exercise of discretion or to coerce citizens or to aid voters, be overrated. If an election cannot be conducted without foreign troops to protect the men who vote and the men who count, there should be no election. Military used to protect those who count and those who vote will prove to be military used to put down liberty under the guise of protecting it, and to be the more dangerous because of its disguise.

Under the authority of the very words now sought to be repealed a President, fresh from the command of a victorious army, with the apparent object of continuing his party in power in several States of the Union, stationed portions of the United States Army at places where the people were lawfully assembled to elect State and Federal officers, and thereby prevented free elections. He caused to be made and unmade Legislatures of sovereign States by the arbitrary exercise of military force. He stationed soldiers in the halls of courts of justice when they were in session. He deposed judges, and arrested and imprisoned citizens under the suspension of the habeas corpus. He concentrated portions of the Army and Navy around this Capitol during the session of Congress while the electoral votes for President and Vice-President were being counted, and committed almost every species of political tyranny in the interest of his party by way of subordinating civil to military rule, in violation of the rights of the people and of the spirit and genius of republican institutions. If the right to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls can be constitutionally exercised under this law, which I do not believe, it may at any time, under the false pretext of apprehended disorder, be seized upon as a justification for its use for merely partisan purposes. With such fresh and flagrant examples of military usurpation before us, we should be satisfied that the only safety to the country is in the abolishment of the apparent authority and with it all claims that might be sought to be justified under that pretended authority.

I also quote from a speech made in regard to outrages in South Carolina by a gentleman from that State, [Mr. RICHARDSON:]

SOUTH CAROLINA.

This is the law they want to carry elections with in the South, while in the North they want United States marshals to arrest without warrant and on suspicion. No one can doubt this who witnessed the elections conducted under bayonet rule in the South in 1876, when the soldier, with drawn sword in hand, directed who should vote. Lest this astounding statement should be doubted, I quote from the uncontradicted testimony taken in the contested-election case of Tillman vs. Smalls. At page 576 Mr. T. I. Adams, testifying as to the voting in South Carolina in 1876 at box No. 2, known as the school-house box, makes the following sworn statement:

"Question. State, Mr. Adams, what you saw while standing in the school-house waiting to vote.

"Answer. I saw Lieutenant Hoyt jump in the window; from three to five soldiers followed him; he went up very near the box and drew his saber and had the soldiers fix their bayonets.

"Q. When he drew his sword was his attitude a threatening one?

"A. It was; it would have frightened a timid man, to say the least of it.

"Q. What did the soldiers do after they fixed their bayonets?

"A. They remained in that attitude until I left. I was there about thirty minutes. There was a company outside of the house in plain view of the building."

Mr. Abraham Jones, an aged and most respectable citizen, testifies, at page 595, as follows:

"Question. Have you not been a member of the Legislature, and have you not filled other offices in the county?

"Answer. I was elected to the Legislature six times, and have held other offices ever since from the time I was twenty-one.

"Q. Did you vote; and, if you did, where did you vote?

"A. At Morrison's school-house that day.

"Q. How long did you remain there that day?

"A. I was there from two o'clock until nearly dark.

"Q. While you were there did you see any intimidation by the whites?

"A. No; I did not. I saw men with red shirts riding about the streets hallooing but did not see any intimidation attempted by them.

"Q. Did you notice anything peculiar about the way the election was conducted? If so, state it fully.

"A. I saw the United States soldiers as a guard around the door outside and a crowd of voters outside pressing this guard, who kept them back with their guns, and an officer in command, with his sword drawn; and he would select with his sword by touching those who were to go in next to vote. As the colored man at the door would call out, 'Send in ten men,' the officer would again select by touching with his sword those to go, not taking them as they came, but selecting them from the crowd, sometimes reaching over to touch one behind another, and sometimes skipping two or three. I was selected from the crowd with another white man at the same time, and none dared go in but those who were so touched by this officer. When they had voted, they were let out of a window."

It will be remembered that these United States soldiers were sent into the State without the State Legislature having been convened or attempted to be convened, as is required by the State constitution to be done before the governor is authorized or empowered to ask the President to send them; that they were sent at a time when General Ruger, a United States officer, then in South Carolina, in command of a few troops stationed there, had telegraphed the President, "If I need more troops I will send you a dispatch telling you I need them;" and when every judge in South Carolina, all republicans except one, had certified that the State was in peace and quiet and in ready obedience to the civil process of the law.

FLORIDA.

The Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] whose candor no one will question, says:

I have seen soldiers of the United States marched and counter-marched over my State, and if the Senator from Maine wants to look into the records of the War Department he can find evidences there showing that the troops in my State as late as 1876 were ordered from the forts on the seaboard hundreds of miles in the interior, to be present at the elections of the people. I assert the fact here that at the election of 1876 nearly a company of troops were ordered from Fort Barancas, Florida, to Marianna, Florida, and were present in that little town during the election of that year. I met them on that day there, and never shall I forget the feelings of humiliation that came over me when I learned the true object of their mission.

But military interference did not end with the election at the polls. Well do I remember the scenes in my own State. After the election I saw an officer in full uniform, with his side arms on, remain in the presence of the State officers until they had canvassed the returns from the various voting places in my own county, where there was not the slightest reason to apprehend trouble of any kind. And when the time came for the enactment of the drama of fraud, when the courage of the faithless officers who had determined to falsify the voice of the people of the State had to be supported in some way, when the consciousness of the great wrong they were about to commit filled the air around them with imaginary dangers and their souls stood aghast at the terrors of the great crime, a large part of the Army, with a general officer, was sent to sustain them and give a reluctant sanction to those proceedings which ended in robbing the whole American people of their highest and dearest right. In the course of a week it was easy to concentrate at the capital of my little State an armed force of three hundred men to shield the preconcerted villainy of a returning board and strike down the vital principles of popular freedom.

Where troops are used at the polls it is to be feared that the cartridge-box might be exchanged for the ballot-box, the bullet for the ballot. The bayonet which has pierced the writ of habeas corpus issued by the Chief-Justice of the United States might be used to destroy the ballot of the citizen seeking to vote. The sword, professing to guard the voters at the polls, might intimidate the voter and keep him away from the polls. The timid and unarmed and disorganized body of citizens cannot hold their place at the polls against a band of Federal marshals with their batons of governmental authority and the organized troops of the Government with the flag of the country floating over them.

Think of a presidential election in which the Commander-in-Chief of the troops is a candidate, and it is folly to suppose that it is safe to leave the unarmed citizen to stand his ground against the whole civil and military force of the Government.

When the returning boards in the several States which were fraudulently created in 1876 were engaged in their nefarious work and Congress was in session struggling for an honest count, troops were hurried here and posted under the shadow of the Capitol to coerce the will of the representatives of the people, enforce the right of the President of the Senate to count the vote, register the fraudulent counts of the returning boards, and complete the work of fraud and wrong.

Troops were concentrated at the Capitol; President Grant avowed his purpose and the fact. In a talk with an Associated Press reporter, December 10, 1876, he said:

There are six hundred or eight hundred troops in Washington. If there should be any necessity for more I will order them hither.

The report of the War Department to the House shows that on July 10, 1876, there was not a single soldier in Washington. Their report of January 9, 1877, shows that there were then 771 soldiers at the arsenal. In South Carolina there were 538 soldiers on July 10, 1876, and on January 9, 1877, there were 1,466. In Louisiana in 1876 there were 506 soldiers, and in 1877, 1,391.

Troops were ordered to the Southern States the day after Congress adjourned in 1876, and not before. This was fitly the crowning act in a drama of force and fraud. "National elections" we have found to be troops and marshals at the places of registration; troops and marshals at the ballot-box, with intimidation and force dominating the voter; troops and marshals to protect the false and fraudulent counters in their false and fraudulent work; and, crowning infamy to the sickening drama, troops of the United States concentrated at the Capitol to overawe the representatives of the people and to seat by the power of the sword a President who was never chosen. If these be the "national elections" to which a free people are invited, we trust we will have no more of them.

The National Republican, the organ of the Administration here, in its leading editorial of January 4, 1877, says:

"THE ONLY WAY OUT OF THE WOODS."

In an editorial in the National Republican a few days since it was stated in plain and unmistakable terms that the counting of the electoral vote will be done by the President of the Senate, according to the Constitution and historical precedent. It was also stated in quite as positive terms that should the House, after the President of the Senate had declared the one hundred and eighty-five votes for Hayes, attempt to elect Tilden, it will be treason against the Government, and those participating in the movement will be arrested as insurrectionists on the spot.

The New York Sun, in referring to this article, says:

"Let it not be supposed that this revolutionary scheme to Mexicanize the Government is the wild declaration of an irresponsible partisan. It is part of the plot which has been matured in detail, and to sustain which a large force of artillery and other troops have been collected at Washington and its vicinity by the Secretary of War during the last three or four weeks."

The troops are here to preserve the peace, and that peace will only be broken by an attempt on the part of the democracy to oppose the result of the counting under the forms of law and the Constitution.

The way for the republican party is as clear as the face of a cloudless day. Their duty is to stand by the constitutional mode of counting the vote, and follow scrupulously the precedent established by the electoral counts which have occurred in the past. The Constitution says, "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted."

* * * * * * * *

Thus will be seen the justice of our assertion when we announced that should the House, after Hayes is declared elected by the President of the Senate, attempt to elect Tilden, it will be summarily arrested for inciting insurrection against the authorities of the United States and the law thereof. What loyal-hearted patriot is there in all the broad domain of the Republic who now casts a shadow of blame upon the immortal Lincoln for thrusting into Fort Lafayette those who sought to disturb the peace of the nation by treason against its lawful authorities? There is none now; will there be any in the coming crisis?

FEDERAL ABSORPTION.

This exercise of Federal power, unlimited and unwarranted, is with deliberate purpose. It is the design of those who advocate and adopt these measures to bring the country to the condition of consolidation, to cause every personal and financial interest to look for protection and security to the Federal Government and to lessen and decry the powers of the States. Absorption at Washington of every political and social interest will give continued control to the advocates of consolidation. See how it operates in a brief twelve years. In the Thirty-ninth Congress, ending March 4, 1867, there were introduced—

Senate bills	635
Senate joint resolutions	184
House bills	1,234
House joint resolutions	305
Total	2,378

In the Forty-fifth Congress, ending March 4, 1879:

Senate bills	1,863
Senate joint resolutions	71
House bills	6,549
House joint resolutions	248
Total	8,731

PATRONAGE.

With the power of a standing army to dominate the people at the polls, which you supplement by marshals and supervisors for the control of the great cities of the North, you wield the official patronage of the Government at your own sweet will. The people have but little conception either of the magnitude of this engine of political power or of the enormous burden it is upon the resources of the tax-payers.

The last official register of the employés of the Government makes the total number about 75,000 persons, but it takes no account of those employed upon the public works of the country or of the special deputy marshals employed and paid for political service at the polls; of these the Attorney-General, under date of April, 1879, says there were, in 1878, 5,494.

If we add to these at least five thousand persons employed upon Government works who are always wielded by the governmental power to sustain the Administration, and as many more for undoubted deficiency in the figures given for the Post-Office, Navy, and Treasury Departments, we find the totals to be as follows:

Employés named in Official Register	74,431
Deputy marshals in 1878	5,494
Workmen on Government works	5,000
Deficiency in Post-Office, Treasury, and Navy Departments.	5,000
Total Federal employés	89,925

The aggregate amount paid to this horde of officials in the last fiscal year is about $31,000,000 of the money wrung from the tax-payers of the country.

How has this enormous patronage been used? To override the free will of the people at the polls. It has been made a living reality in its menace to the freedom of elections. Every man in governmental employ has been required at the risk of loss of place to work for his party; republican policy tolerates no drones. Their men are selected for their efficiency as politicians and their value to their party. They are wielded by skilled organizers to keep their party in power. They subscribe of their salary, they go home to vote, they proselyte voters, all for their party. The army of office-holders, the money they subscribe, the Army and Navy, the prestige and power of every Federal place, are all made effective agencies for perpetuating the succession of republican rule.

Ninety thousand men acting as drill sergeants, whose places depend upon their zeal and success, are a powerful lever in controlling elections. Thirty-one millions of money assessable and assessed for political purposes annually aid materially in defeating the free will of a free people.

George C. Gorham, secretary of the republican national committee for 1878, testifies before the select committee of the Senate that circulars asking for 1 per cent. on their salaries were sent in 1878 to all the employés of the Federal Government named in the Official Register for election purposes of the republican party; that his committee received from Federal office-holders in 1878 $93,000 and from all other sources $13,000; that State committees of the republican party were also authorized to collect money from Federal officials, and did so. This money was used by the committee in helping to elect republican members of Congress. One per cent. on $31,000,000 is equal to $310,000 annually of a corruption fund wrung from official patronage to perpetuate republican power.

Duncan S. Walker, secretary of the democratic national committee, testified that the whole amount of money collected and used in 1878 by that committee was $4,695, and that this was expended for printing, rent, &c.

Mr. Gorham's testimony and that of his assistants shows that the assessment plan was vigorously applied in every one of the Departments, and no person who drew money from the Government was overlooked. Solicitors were sent through each Department several times, and those employés who failed to pony up to them were subsequently reminded by circulars of the "debt of honor" they were expected to pay. The money was raised to be used in carrying the House for the republicans. This was openly announced, and Mr. Gorham remembered having sent the following amounts to the congressional districts named:

Maine	$5,000
New Hampshire	1,750
Vermont, third district	500
Connecticut, third district	1,000

Cobaugh, Burke, and Russell, clerks in the Treasury and Interior Departments, testify that the republican clerks in Washington were equipped with free tickets and tax receipts, and sent home to vote. Men are employed to work by the Government prior to election and dismissed when they have served the purpose of voters to maintain republican power. The navy-yard at Boston has been used for this purpose.

BOSTON NAVY-YARD.

I quote from the report in the case of Abbott vs. Frost, House Doc. 49, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 415, a letter from J. W. Easby, naval constructor:

NAVY-YARD, BOSTON,
NAVAL CONSTRUCTOR'S OFFICE,
December 4, 1874.

COMMODORE: In obedience to your order of this date, I respectfully report as follows:

Between the 1st and 31st of October last there were taken on the rolls of this department by requisition five hundred and eighty-six men.

The employment of these men was authorized by the bureau's orders dated 7th, 10th, 12th, and 16th October, 1874, and they were at work on the new shop at Saint Mary's, stowing and piling timber, breaking up the Virginia, docking the Plymouth, receiving stores, shipping material belonging to the Miantonomah, keeping ships, &c.

Very respectfully,

J. W. EASBY,
Naval Constructor, U. S. N.

Commodore E. T. NICHOLS,
U. S. N., Commandant Navy-yard.

I read now the letter of E. T. Nichols, commandant, of December 5, 1874.

Chief Constructor J. HANSCOMB, U. S. N.,
Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repairs, Washington, D. C.:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the bureau's letter of the 2d instant, informing me that in examining the pay-rolls of construction at this yard for the months of September and October it is noticed the force was largely increased during the latter month. Will you be good enough to inform the bureau under what orders this increase was made?

While I may be excused for expressing surprise at this inquiry, I beg leave respectfully to reply somewhat at length and in detail, to wit:

The direct official orders I have for an increase of force in October are as follows, namely: First, a telegraphic order from the chief of the Bureau of Construction, dated October 7, to employ twenty additional men in construction department, by order of the Secretary; second, a written order from the chief of Bureau of Construction, dated October 16, to increase the force in the construction department, for the purpose of completing the ships and boats for the new sloops-of-war and for stowing the timber in the yard.

By the report of the naval constructor, accompanying this, it will be seen how many additional men were employed during the entire month and the nature of their employment. The two orders of the 10th and 12th, cited by Mr. Easby, were for one man each, and I do not deem it necessary to cite them.

That I had every reason to think and believe that the increase which was made in October was fully known to and approved by the bureau the above-cited orders and the following orders and transactions seem clearly to show.

To go back a little in the order of time, I would say that the increase of force began in September. On the 7th of that month a communication was addressed to me by the chief of the bureau directing me to enter the names of seven men on the rolls. On the 24th of the same month a requisition for twenty men was sent in by Naval Constructor Pook. Upon ascertaining that there were no funds to pay this additional force I declined to approve it. In reply to my inquiry as to why he sent in requisitions for men when he had not the means of paying them he stated that those particular names had been handed to him by outside parties with a request that he would require them. On the same day, namely, September 24, I received an official communication from Mr. Pook, informing me that the money "allowed for the present month will be expended Friday night, September 25," upon the receipt of which I issued orders to suspend work in the construction department from the 25th to the 1st proximo. On the 26th of September I received telegraphic orders, of same date, from the honorable Secretary not to stop work in the construction department. September 28, I telegraphed to the Bureau of Construction to know what money would be allowed for October. September 29, bureau replied in effect, for same force as in September, and make no additions to the rolls.

Soon after the 1st of October, Mr. Easby, naval constructor, informed me that he had been approached by outsiders with inquiries as to why the twenty men required for on the 24th of September had not been taken in. I directed him to reply that the requisition had not been, and would not be, approved by the commandant, there being no funds for their payment. Within a few days afterward, namely, October 7, I received a telegraphic order from the Bureau of Construction to employ twenty additional men. These were the men I had twice refused to approve a requisition for. On October 16 an order was issued by the bureau providing for an increase of force, which order has already been cited. Under this order a considerable increase was made, but I am inclined to think that the largest share of the increase was made subsequent to the 23d of October, at which time the chief of the bureau was in Boston. On October 25 I received a telegraphic order from the honorable Secretary of the Navy to make no suspensions in any department of this yard until further orders, and that money would be furnished on proper requisitions.

It is manifest from this that a suspension I had ordered, and its cause, namely, shortness of funds, was known in Washington. On the 4th of November, the reduction of force began by my order. The bureau issued its order to reduce on the 5th, while the order of the Secretary, of October 25, to make no suspension until further order, (virtually an order to make no change,) was not revoked or changed until November 13.

I have been thus full and particular in my reply to the bureau's letter, to show that if the increase of force in this yard was unauthorized, the responsibility does not rest with the commandant, as the foregoing recital clearly shows that every effort made by him to prevent an increase and to save money was frustrated by some outside influence more powerful than his own.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ED. T. NICHOLS,
Commandant.

CUSTOM-HOUSES.

I also read from the report of Mr. NEW, August 10, 1876, No. 816, House, first session, Forty-fourth Congress, pages 2 and 3:

From uncontradicted evidence it appears that the custom-house at New Orleans was made to contribute, in large sums taken from its revenues, to partisan ends. The manner of perpetrating these frauds was in this way: a number of vouchers would be made out in the custom-house, apparently all regularly signed and sworn to, purporting to be for services rendered in the custom-house. These vouchers were generally for the sum of $93, and often reached a great number per month, aggregating thousands of dollars. The service specified in the voucher was that of temporary laborer, in almost every instance, and these were made out in addition to the monthly vouchers for the permanent employés proper of the custom-house. Many of the names attached to these vouchers were fictitious, and in others the parties named never rendered a moment's service in the custom-house. Under the law these vouchers were required to be sworn to, and appended to each was the notarial and official signature of Mr. Crawford, an entry clerk in the custom-house, and commissioned as a notary public.

In many instances no oath was administered, but the vouchers thus made out were forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury as vouchers for the disbursements made by the collector of customs at New Orleans, and the money thus fraudulently obtained would be applied to political uses. (See testimony on pages 181, 182, 183, 184, and 185; also on pages 105, 106, 107, 110, 111, and 450.)

The facts thus established were in no manner contradicted or explained. The perpetration of this crime was not an occasional thing, but was shown to be an established system. The evidence shows that in many instances the pollution of the ballot-box itself was the consideration for the payment of the money thus unlawfully obtained. (See testimony on pages 197, 198, 199, 342, 423, 450, and 451.)

We discovered at least one high officer of the Government, outside of the custom-house, having knowledge of its prevalence, and whose sworn duty it was to expose it to the proper authorities, complacently witnessing its exercise and making no effort to check or prevent it. We refer to Daniel P. Kinsella, special agent of the Treasury Department, located at New Orleans. (See testimony of Kinsella himself, on pages 337, 338, 339, and 340.)

It also appears from the evidence that this officer had two minor sons who, for several years, had been drawing unusually large salaries from the custom-house, one of whom was employed in his own private office. We regard such acceptance of favors toward his own family as inconsistent with the proprieties of the service, and tending to demoralize and blunt his own sense of duty as an agent of the Government.

It is impossible for your committee to ascertain the exact amount of money thus obtained from the public Treasury, but from all the circumstances the conviction is forced on the minds of your committee that all or nearly all of the entire sum of money represented by the vouchers referred to was absolutely stolen. The number of these vouchers was often increased, taking each month large sums of money illegally from the Treasury. According to the testimony of all the witnesses who were examined on this subject, these vouchers were made out in duplicate, and although duplicates of all other vouchers for disbursements by the collector were retained by him, the committee were unable to procure the duplicates of any of these vouchers for temporary service; the reason assigned at one time being that they could not be found, and at another that they had not been preserved or retained. The committee notified the collector of its sessions at New Orleans, and subpœnaed him, but he did not appear, alleging illness as the reason. This fact, supplementing the positive evidence establishing these corrupt practices, can lead to but one conclusion.

Another glaring fraud was perpetrated through the department of repairs and preservation of public buildings. The sum of $5,000 was paid out by the Government on a contract with E. A. Davis for the repair of the United States warehouse at quarantine station on the Mississippi River, and the erection of a new wharf thereat. Mr. Davis testified that he signed the contract; that he never did any work under the contract; that he never rendered any account which showed that the contract had been complied with or that any work had been performed; that he had not earned the money; that the full sum of $5,000 was paid to him only four or five days after having signed the contract, and that he returned the whole amount to Mr. J. H. Sypher, at whose personal request he had signed the contract. He testified also that he had heard since, in general conversation, that the money was used for electioneering purposes. It was not pretended that any such work was done for which the Government had paid the sum of $5,000. The following letter will show the official character of the transaction in the account rendered to the Government by James F. Casey, disbursing agent at New Orleans, and how the Government was defrauded:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SUPERVISING ARCHITECT,
July 31, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 29th instant, I have the honor to inform you that a contract was entered into under date of October 18, 1872, between Edward A. Davis, of New Orleans, Louisiana, and J. F. Morse, then superintendent of the United States custom-house in that city, for the repair of the United States warehouse at quarantine station on the Mississippi River, in Louisiana, and the erection of a new wharf thereat, according to plans and specifications furnished by the said Morse. In compensation therefor he was to receive the sum of $5,000. This contract is attached to a voucher receipted by Edward A. Davis, for the sum of $5,000, transmitted with the account of James F. Casey, disbursing agent, New Orleans, Louisiana, for the month of October, 1872, under the appropriation for "Repairs and preservation of public buildings."

Very respectfully,

WM. A. POTTER,
Supervising Architect.

Hon. R. S. GIBSON,
Chairman of Committee, &c., House of Representatives.

The open and unblushing use of the public revenues for the benefit of candidates of any political party is a sad evidence of the thorough demoralization of the civil service. That a custom-house of the Government should be thus run as a political machine, not only placing men upon the rolls who are not needed, for the purpose of obtaining their votes, but by placing fictitious names upon the rolls for the purpose of pilfering from the public revenues moneys to be used in the election of the candidates of a political party, is not only most corrupting upon those in the public service, but suggests the enactment of a law so severe in its provisions as to prevent, if possible, a recurrence of such official malfeasance in the future.

By this use of public patronage and official power the Federal Government is made to swell the power of the republican party and aid to maintain its succession to itself. So fruitful a field is this and so valuable the power that was thus used that the appropriations of the Government were swollen annually from 1868 until the democracy came to power, for patronage and money gave added influence. The expenses of the United States courts have nearly doubled since 1868. A comparison of the figures shows the large absorption of public money in that field:

APPROPRIATIONS.

Your appropriations increased from one hundred and fifty millions in 1868 to one hundred and eighty-nine millions in 1874, when the advent of a democratic House of Representatives coerced retrenchment and has reduced them to one hundred and fifty-seven millions in 1879. I annex a table giving the official figures and the totals, as follows:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, all have been passed but the two bills known as the Army and the legislative appropriation bills, which I approximate in the following table. The decrease in appropriations from 1874 to 1880 is thus seen to be over $28,000,000.

*Estimated.

To this is to be added the appropriation for arrears of pension, $26,867,200, which is extraordinary in character.

The civil and miscellaneous expenses of the Government for the year 1860 were about twenty-eight millions; for 1876 they were seventy-three millions.

The growth of Federal power, the absorption to itself of that which properly belongs to local rule, is the vice of this legislation. It is destructive of the system of government created by the Constitution and tends to produce consolidation and empire. We have traced "national elections" and shown their non-existence as a part of our written Constitution. We find them an outgrowth of false construction, of the theory of centralization, and identical in thought with the tenets of 1799, as well as vicious in practice. We find that troops at the polls were voted for by the advocates of a consolidated government in 1800 as they are by the same party now, and that packed juries and Federal marshals were the agents then of wrong as they are now of force and fraud. From these our only defense is in the reserved rights of the States and the people. The Federal Government is not the sovereign, but is the servant of the people, and it has no rights but those delegated to it or necessary to carry out the powers granted, and the States and the governments of the States are essential to the perfection of the system. Suffrage is under the control of the States; the Federal Government can neither create a voter nor impose qualifications upon one. National elections, if such there be, have no national electors, and the voters of the United States are the people of the States, qualified under State constitutions and State laws. The statutes proposed to be repealed judge who shall vote, register voters, reject voters, enforce restrictions, and impose penalties, all without authority and in plain violation of the rights reserved to the States and the people.

Marshals are created and used to enforce State laws and State restrictions in State constitutions. The Federal power gives the marshals the power of Federal troops to aid them thus to enforce State rules and State restrictions; and they are vested with the right to judge and determine who are qualified under State constitutions and State laws. This system of national elections contended for in these veto messages may be aptly described by saying that Federal marshals and Federal troopers are necessary and are again to be used at the ballot-box. They have been placed there to dominate and intimidate the voter, to decide how he shall vote and what qualifications are necessary. Federal troops and Federal marshals have been used and are to be preserved to protect returning boards in the States, to aid and defend them in their work of fraud and wrong, and Federal troops have been brought to the capital of the United States to defend and protect the counting into office of an official who was never chosen. The republican party has been and is again to be protected by marshals at the polls without authority of law and in violation of the provisions fixed in State constitutions and by State laws, and to be sustained by Federal power unwarranted by the Constitution.

May we never again see, under such a system of laws as we possess, the polls controlled by force and intimidation, the returning boards protected in fraud and wrong by Federal troops and Federal officials, and an ultimate tribunal powerless in its own opinion to repel bald fraud, while the Representatives of the people were menaced with military force if they dared to do right and protect an honest count. "National elections" are the outgrowth of a system that has foisted into power a man against whom a majority of the people had voted, and who now presents to the American people, through the arguments of his veto messages, the doctrines of force and fraud concealed beneath the cry of "national elections," in which is wanting the first element of their existence, a national voter.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now, if there be no objection, lay before the Senate sundry bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

A bill (H. R. No. 1379) fixing the rate of interest upon arrearages of general taxes and assessments for special improvements now due to the District of Columbia, and for a revision of assessments for special improvements, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District;

A bill (H. R. No. 1856) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to extend the area for the taking up and impounding of domestic animals into the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 1894) authorizing the employment of an inspector of plumbing in and for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 72) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place vessels and hulks at the disposal of commissioners of quarantine or other persons, at the ports of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

IMPROVEMENT OF KANAWHA RIVER.

Mr. HEREFORD. I move to postpone the pending order and proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repairs, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the bill been reported by a committee?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported on the 22d of this month from the Committee on Commerce without amendment.

Mr. HEREFORD. I simply desire to say that it is merely a local matter. At the last session of Congress there was an appropriation made for the improvement of the Kanawha River. I have a letter here from the Chief of Engineers and also from the Secretary of War drawing the attention of the Committee on Commerce to the fact that it will be necessary with a portion of that money to purchase sites and that they do not think they have a right to purchase sites without authority from Congress. The bill simply provides that a sufficient portion of the money heretofore appropriated may be used for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the pending order to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879. It provides that such parts of the moneys heretofore appropriated by the act of which this is amendatory for the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, in West Virginia, and the Kentucky River, in the State of Kentucky, as may be necessary in the prosecution of those improvements as undertaken, may be expended in the purchase, voluntary or by condemnation, as the case may be, of such sites as are necessary in the prosecution of the improvements.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire how much money is appropriated by the act which this seeks to amend to the purpose denoted in this bill?

Mr. HEREFORD. For this particular purpose?

Mr. CONKLING. How much money is appropriated to the improvement of the Great Kanawha River mentioned in the bill?

Mr. HEREFORD. I believe $150,000; and $25,000 for the Big Sandy River, in Kentucky.

Mr. CONKLING. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars for the two rivers mentioned in the bill?

Mr. HEREFORD. For the two purposes. The object of this bill is simply to use enough of that amount to purchase the sites indicated.

Mr. TELLER. Sites for what?

Mr. HEREFORD. For locks or dams.

Mr. TELLER. Are they building locks on that river?

Mr. HEREFORD. Yes, sir. There are several already built.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, no matter how clear and conclusive the objections to this bill might be, I should have no idea that any statement or argument coming from me would defeat it or delay its passage longer than the time which I might occupy in assigning the objections. I venture, however, to state at least to the Senate as I understand it, the meaning and scope of this bill.

This body and the other branch of Congress some time ago passed a bill known as the river and harbor bill. In placing that enactment among the statutes, the two Houses proceeded, I infer, under the power or supposed power of Congress to improve national highways of commerce. That power I take it must reside in one or both of two clauses of the Constitution, that which permits the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, or that under which Congress is authorized to appropriate money.

The understanding of those who voted for that bill, and especially for the provision of it to which this pending measure relates, must have been that they were about in West Virginia to improve a national highway, a commercial channel not local but national in its character, in its dimensions, in its surroundings. It turns out now that the proposed improvement consists, or consists in part, of creating an artificial water channel; it consists in erecting dams to deepen and increase the volume of water, and erecting locks by which are to be lifted from one level to another level the crafts which are to ply on this channel, and then letting them down again from one level to another level. In order to improve such a national channel of commerce as this it is now proposed that, proceeding under the right of eminent domain, the national authority shall enter the State of West Virginia and undertake to condemn private property for public use, making of course, in the language of another provision of the Constitution, just compensation. That is this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator probably does not understand that the State Legislature has already passed a bill giving its consent.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, Mr. President, I shall not forget that. The Senator from West Virginia may be sure that I remember it from the circumstance that I did not add that it was proposed to exert the power of eminent domain under such circumstances that, were the object to build a fort for the common defense or a post-office under express authority of the Constitution, eminent lawyers, coinciding in politics with the Senator from West Virginia, have denied utterly that Congress has power to proceed. If I mistake not, I have heard it stated in this Chamber in the presence of the distinguished member of the Senate who now presides, that even under the express authority to establish post-offices the National Government could not go into a State, defying the power of that State, proceeding without its assent, to condemn private property for that purpose. I say I have heard that argued; but I am not called upon to express any opinion upon it, because, as the Senator from West Virginia has reminded us, that particular point is not here. I was commenting upon so much as is here, upon such features as the pending bill does wear, and I am sorry that the Senator from West Virginia diverted me, because I intended to follow the statement I made immediately with one single observation. I will make it now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator permit me to make a motion to adjourn? We are all very much interested in the Senator's remarks and would like to hear them completed on another day. If it is agreeable to the Senator, I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. I know the Senator from Michigan does not wish to hear me.

Mr. CHANDLER. Indeed I do, I assure the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. I am so thoroughly convinced of that that I will yield at once. I see the Senator would rather go than listen to me; and that disposition on his part is so strong that I will not stand in the way.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 29, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The object of that resolution will be readily understood. It is certainly eminently proper that the members of this House should join the rest of the community in doing honor to the dead whose graves are to be decorated to-morrow. I offer the resolution in order to give them an opportunity of doing so. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend the resolution so as to provide that we adjourn to meet on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The object of the resolution is that the House shall adjourn over Decoration Day, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] so as to allow members of the House to participate in the ceremonies of decoration.

Mr. HAWLEY. It would make a broken day of Saturday, and we had much better adjourn till Monday.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offer the resolution in the shape in which I first presented it. It will be competent for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] afterward to move that the House adjourn until Monday. His amendment might destroy the apparent object of the resolution which I have offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it rather late for an amendment to be offered.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would not do anything, of course, to affect the object the gentleman has in view.

The question was taken upon Mr. JOHNSTON'S resolution; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT SINE DIE.

Mr. GIBSON. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die at twelve o'clock on the 10th day of June, 1879.

Mr. ATKINS. I would ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] not to press that resolution this morning, but let it lie over until Saturday.

Mr. GIBSON. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee and will ask that the resolution lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, his private secretary.

The message further announced that the President had approved and signed the bill (H. R. No. 178) to provide for the change of name of the steamboat Alexis.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. GIBSON.]

The SPEAKER. The resolution goes over by consent at the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. CONGER. But I desire to offer my amendment so that it may have the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. On Saturday the Chair will recognize the gentleman, unless the House should order the previous question and thereby cut off amendments.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to move to add to the resolution the words "provided the appropriation bills have then been passed."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for any amendment, provided the House does not cut off the opportunity of doing so from the Chair, by seconding the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. It was for that very reason that I desired to offer my amendment, so as to notify the House that it would be offered.

IMPORTATION OF QUININE.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I wish to give notice that I will move that the resolution reported by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON] be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions that the same be not reported upon until said committee has first reported for the consideration of this House a bill to admit the importation of quinine free of duty and a bill to establish an income tax.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not provide for any such notice as that.

CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to correct the RECORD. On page 12 of the RECORD it is stated that I offered for reference to the Committee on Rules a resolution. That is a mistake. I offered the proposed amendment to the rules for adoption, but the rules of the House require amendments to the rules to lie over one day, and I offered it at that time because one day's notice was contemplated by the rules. I did not offer it for reference.

Mr. CONGER. Can the gentleman change the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. He does not seek to change the RECORD; he only desires to correct it.

Mr. CONGER. But he desires to place his resolution in some different position from that in which it stood yesterday. The RECORD states the fact, and it cannot be changed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to seek to change the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to say that the RECORD is incorrect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects that he himself stated yesterday that the effect of the gentleman's motion was to compel the resolution to lie over one day. The gentleman will find that statement in the RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not say that I offered the resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules; I merely wanted to correct the RECORD in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the Chair is not at variance with that, because the Chair stated that the motion had to lie over one day.

Mr. SPRINGER. The statement of the Chair is in exact accordance with what I stated at the time.

Mr. FRYE. But the statement in the RECORD is so much more sensible and reasonable that I hope the gentleman will adopt it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will recollect that the Chair stated yesterday what he has now stated.

Mr. FRYE. But the RECORD is a great deal better for the reputation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] than what he now proposes to make it.

VESSELS AND HULKS FOR QUARANTINE PURPOSES.

Mr. GOODE. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs a joint resolution which will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read first.

Mr. GOODE. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report House joint resolution No. 72, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to place vessels and hulks at the disposal of commissioners of quarantine or other proper persons at the ports of the United States, and to ask for its consideration at this time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to place gratuitously at the disposal of the commissioners of quarantine, or the proper authorities at any of the ports of the United States, to be used by them temporarily for quarantine purposes, such vessels or hulks belonging to the United States as are not required for other uses of the National Government, subject to such restrictions and regulations as the said Secretary may deem necessary to impose for the preservation thereof.

Mr. FRYE. By yesterday's action gentlemen on the other side have seized the Treasury; now they propose to take the Navy. I will not make any objection to the joint resolution which has been read, but I am in hopes that they will take the Army to-morrow.

Mr. GOODE. This is in the interest of humanity alone; there is no money in it at all.

Mr. CONGER. I think this joint resolution should be amended so as to require the approval of the National Board of Health, which has been created and given charge of this subject.

Mr. GOODE. I do not know that I will object to that if insisted upon, but I will state to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that this joint resolution is unanimously reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I have here a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending its passage. I will call the attention of the gentleman, furthermore, to the fact that such a resolution as this has been in existence almost from time immemorial until recently, when it expired by limitation. The Secretary of the Navy now states it will be necessary for Congress to take this action before he can allow the temporary use of these old, condemned vessels for this purpose. It is simply in the interest of humanity. Merchant vessels going north and south and having sick men on board are not provided with the accommodations for the proper care of those sick men, and ought to be allowed to utilize these condemned vessels and hulks for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. But this joint resolution proposes to give these vessels to State quarantine commissions. Now, we have passed a bill giving the supervision of this whole subject to the National Board of Health which has been created by act of Congress.

Mr. GOODE. I have no objection in the world to obtaining the consent of the Board of Health for this purpose. I am satisfied that the consent will be given whenever asked. Let the gentleman suggest what amendment he desires to have made.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest that the words "with the approval of the National Board of Health" be inserted.

Mr. GOODE. Very well; I will not object to that.

Mr. CONGER. If that is inserted it will in my mind strike out all of the State-rights objection there may be to the joint resolution in its present form.

Mr. GOODE. I am willing to make it entirely satisfactory to the gentleman from Michigan in that respect.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move to insert after the words "in his discretion" the words "with the approval of the National Board of Health."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GOODE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution, as amended, was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. There are several gentlemen who desire to be recognized by the Chair for the purpose of bringing matters before the House to which there will be no objection. The Chair thinks it would be well to allow them an opportunity to do so.

Mr. HUBBELL. It occurs to me that the language of the amendment just adopted to the joint resolution reported by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] is not appropriate.

The SPEAKER. It is now too late; the joint resolution has been passed.

Mr. HUBBELL. Instead of "with the approval" it should be "at the request of the National Board of Health."

The SPEAKER. The language now employed in the amendment will make the assignment of these vessels by the Secretary not final until the Board of Health had approved it. That is so.

Mr. HUBBELL. I ask unanimous consent that the language be changed so that it shall read "at the request of the National Board of Health," instead of subject to the approval.

Mr. GOODE. I myself prefer that language, but I consented to the amendment in order to satisfy the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. HUBBELL. I think the joint resolution should provide that the Secretary of the Navy might place these vessels at the disposal of the different quarantine commissioners at the request of the National Board of Health.

The SPEAKER. That change can be made now by unanimous consent, and only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to modifying the amendment so as to read "at the request of the National Board of Health."

Mr. GOODE. That is right; I think that modification should be made.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the amendment to the joint resolution just passed will be modified as suggested.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the matters contained in the report No. 112 of the Committee on Naval Affairs, third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, relating to the investigation of the Navy Department, together with the views of the minority of said committee, as well as the testimony referred to in said report, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to examine the same and to report whether any action should be taken and had upon said matters therein reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

Mr. CONGER. I object. I object to the resurrection of old dead carcasses.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. But it is not dead; it liveth.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has worked for years to get that in, and his own friends have forbidden it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No, sir; you are mistaken.

PAY OF LABORERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DE LA MATYR asked unanimous consent to introduce a bill to amend an act appropriating $75,000 to pay laborers in this District.

Mr. BREWER. I object.

CONDITION OF EUROPEAN WORKING CLASSES.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. By direction of that committee I report back, with an amendment, the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 15,000 copies of the consular reports, with the letter of the Secretary of State transmitting the same, showing the rates of wages, hours of labor, prices of food, and general condition of the working classes in the several countries of Europe; 8,000 copies for the use of the House, 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Department of State; and that the amount of money necessary for the publication of the same be and is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment proposed by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "and that the amount of money necessary for the publication of the same be and is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "that of the said 15,000 copies 5,000 shall be bound in cloth and 10,000 shall be bound in paper."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CANAL COMMUNICATION BETWEEN ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC OCEANS.

Mr. GIBSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President is requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, what measures have been adopted or may in his judgment be expedient to promote the interests of the United States in the matter of the establishment of communication by canal between the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans across, over, or near the isthmus connecting North and South America.

VETO OF LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CONVERSE. I ask unanimous consent to make a report at this time. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. There is objection. The gentleman will be recognized hereafter. The Chair lays before the House a communication from the President of the United States

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

After mature consideration of the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," I herewith return it to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with the following objections to its approval:

The main purpose of the bill is to appropriate the money required to support during the next fiscal year the several civil departments of the Government. The amount appropriated exceeds in the aggregate $18,000,000.

This money is needed to keep in operation the essential functions of all the great Departments of the Government, legislative, executive, and judicial. If the bill contained no other provisions no objection to its approval would be made. It embraces, however, a number of clauses relating to subjects of great general interest, which are wholly unconnected with the appropriations which it provides for. The objections to the practice of tacking general legislation to appropriation bills, especially when the object is to deprive a co-ordinate branch of the Government of its right to the free exercise of its own discretion and judgment touching such general legislation, were set forth in the special message in relation to House bill No. 1, which was returned to the House of Representatives on the 29th of last month. I regret that the objections which were then expressed to this method of legislation have not seemed to Congress of sufficient weight to dissuade from this renewed incorporation of general enactments in an appropriation bill, and that my constitutional duty in respect of the general legislation thus placed before me cannot be discharged without seeming to delay, however briefly, the necessary appropriations by Congress for the support of the Government. Without repeating those objections, I respectfully refer to that message for a statement of my views on the principle maintained in debate by the advocates of this bill, namely, that "to withhold appropriations is a constitutional means for the redress" of what the majority of the House of Representatives may regard as "a grievance."

The bill contains the following clauses, namely:

And provided further, That the following sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, namely, sections 2016, 2018, and 2020, and all of the succeeding sections of said statutes down to and including section 2027, and also section 5522, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; * * * and that all the other sections of the Revised Statutes and all laws and parts of laws authorizing the appointment of chief supervisors of elections, special deputy marshals of elections, or general deputy marshals, having any duties to perform in respect to any election, and prescribing their duties and powers and allowing them compensation, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

It also contains clauses amending sections 2017, 2019, 2028, and 2031 of the Revised Statutes.

The sections of the Revised Statutes which the bill, if approved, would repeal, or amend, are part of an act, approved May 30, 1870, and amended February 28, 1871, entitled "An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes." All of the provisions of the above-named acts which it is proposed in this bill to repeal or modify relate to the congressional elections. The remaining portion of the law, which will continue in force after the enactment of this measure, is that which provides for the appointment, by a judge of the circuit court of the United States, of two supervisors of election in each election district, at any congressional election, on due application of citizens who desire, in the language of the law, "to have such an election guarded and scrutinized." The duties of the supervisors will be to attend at the polls at all congressional elections, and to remain after the polls are open until every vote cast has been counted, but they will "have no authority to make arrests, or to perform other duties than to be in the immediate presence of the officers holding the election, and to witness all their proceedings, including the counting of the votes, and the making of a return thereof." The part of the election law which will be repealed by the approval of this bill includes those sections which give authority to the supervisors of election "to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot," and all the sections which confer authority upon the United States marshals and deputy marshals, in connection with the congressional elections. The enactment of this bill will also repeal section 5522 of the Criminal Statutes of the United States, which was enacted for the protection of United States officers engaged in the discharge of their duties at the congressional elections. This section protects supervisors and marshals in the performance of their duties by making the obstruction or the assaulting of these officers, or any interference with them by bribery or solicitation, or otherwise, crimes against the United States.

The true meaning and effect of the proposed legislation are plain. The supervisors, with the authority to observe and witness the proceedings at the congressional elections, will be left; but there will be no power to protect them, or to prevent interference with their duties, or to punish any violation of the law from which their powers are derived. If this bill is approved, only the shadow of the authority of the United States at the national elections will remain—the substance will be gone. The supervision of the elections will be reduced to a mere inspection, without authority on the part of the supervisors to do any act whatever to make the election a fair one. All that will be left to the supervisors is the permission to have such oversight of the elections as political parties are in the habit of exercising without any authority of law, in order to prevent their opponents from obtaining unfair advantages. The object of the bill is to destroy any control whatever by the United States over the congressional elections.

The passage of this bill has been urged upon the ground that the election of members of Congress is a matter which concerns the States alone; that these elections should be controlled exclusively by the States; that there are and can be no such elections as national elections; and that the existing law of the United States regulating the congressional elections is without warrant in the Constitution. It is evident, however, that the framers of the Constitution regarded the election of members of Congress in every State and in every district as, in a very important sense, justly a matter of political interest and concern to the whole country. The original provision of the Constitution on this subject is as follows, (section 4, article 1:)

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

A further provision has been since added, which is embraced in the fifteenth amendment. It is as follows:

> SEC. 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.
> SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Under the general provision of the Constitution, (section 4, article 1,) Congress in 1866 passed a comprehensive law which prescribed full and detailed regulations for the election of Senators by the Legislatures of the several States. This law has been in force almost thirteen years. In pursuance of it all the members of the present Senate of the United States hold their seats. Its constitutionality is not called in question. It is confidently believed that no sound argument can be made in support of the constitutionality of national regulation of senatorial elections which will not show that the elections of members of the House of Representatives may also be constitutionally regulated by the national authority.

The bill before me itself recognizes the principle that the congressional elections are not State elections, but national elections. It leaves in full force the existing statute under which supervisors are still to be appointed by national authority, to "observe and witness" the congressional elections whenever due application is made by citizens who desire said elections to be "guarded and scrutinized." If the power to supervise, in any respect whatever, the congressional elections exists under section 4, article 1, of the Constitution, it is a power which, like every other power belonging to the Government of the United States, is paramount and supreme, and includes the right to employ the necessary means to carry it into effect.

The statutes of the United States which regulate the election of members of the House of Representatives, an essential part of which it is proposed to repeal by this bill, have been in force about eight years. Four congressional elections have been held under them, two of which were at the presidential elections of 1872 and 1876.

Numerous prosecutions, trials, and convictions have been had in the courts of the United States in all parts of the Union for violations of these laws. In no reported case has their constitutionality been called in question by any judge of the courts of the United States. The validity of these laws is sustained by the uniform course of judicial action and opinion.

If it is urged that the United States election laws are not necessary, an ample reply is furnished by the history of their origin and of their results. They were especially prompted by the investigation and exposure of the frauds committed in the city and State of New York at the elections of 1868. Committees representing both of the leading political parties of the country have submitted reports to the House of Representatives on the extent of those frauds. A committee of the Fortieth Congress, after a full investigation, reached the conclusion that the number of fraudulent votes cast in the city of New York alone in 1868 was not less than 25,000. A committee of the Forty-fourth Congress, in their report submitted in 1877, adopted the opinion that for every 100 actual voters of the city of New York in 1868, 108 votes were cast; when, in fact, the number of lawful votes cast could not have exceeded 88 per cent. of the actual voters of the city. By this statement the number of fraudulent votes at that election, in the city of New York alone, was between thirty and forty thousand. These frauds completely reversed the result of the election in the State of New York, both as to the choice of governor and State officers, and as to the choice of electors of President and Vice-President of the United States. They attracted the attention of the whole country. It was plain that if they could be continued and repeated with impunity free government was impossible. A distinguished Senator in opposing the passage of the election laws declared that he had "for a long time believed that our form of Government was a comparative failure in the larger cities." To meet these evils and to prevent these crimes the United States laws regulating congressional elections were enacted.

The framers of these laws have not been disappointed in their results. In the large cities, under their provisions, the elections have been comparatively peaceable, orderly, and honest. Even the opponents of these laws have borne testimony to their value and efficiency, and to the necessity for their enactment. The committee of the Forty-fourth Congress, composed of members a majority of whom were opposed to these laws, in their report on the New York election of 1876, said:

> The committee would commend to other portions of the country and to other cities this remarkable system, developed through the agency of both local and Federal authorities acting in harmony for an honest purpose. In no portion of the world, and in no era of time, where there has been an expression of the popular will through the forms of law, has there been a more complete and thorough illustration of republican institutions. Whatever may have been the previous habit or conduct of elections in those cities, or howsoever they may conduct themselves in the future, this election of 1876 will stand as a monument of what good faith, honest endeavor, legal forms, and just authority may do for the protection of the electoral franchise.

This bill recognizes the authority and duty of the United States to appoint supervisors to guard and scrutinize the congressional elections, but it denies to the Government of the United States all power to make its supervision effectual. The great body of the people of all parties want free and fair elections. They do not think that a free election means freedom from the wholesome restraints of law, or that the place of an election should be a sanctuary for lawlessness and crime. On the day of an election peace and good order are more necessary than on any other day of the year. On that day the humblest and feeblest citizens, the aged and the infirm, should be, and should have reason to feel that they are, safe in the exercise of their most responsible duty and their most sacred right as members of society, their duty and their right to vote. The constitutional authority to regulate the congressional elections which belongs to the Government of the United States, and which it is necessary to exert to secure the right to vote to every citizen possessing the requisite qualifications, ought to be enforced by appropriate legislation. So far from public opinion in any part of the country favoring any relaxation of the authority of the Government in the protection of elections from violence and corruption, I believe it demands greater vigor, both in the enactment and in the execution of laws framed for that purpose. Any oppression, any partisan partiality, which experience may have shown in the working of existing laws, may well engage the careful attention both of Congress and of the Executive in their respective spheres of duty for the correction of these mischiefs. As no congressional elections occur until after the regular session of Congress will have been held, there seems to be no public exigency that would preclude a seasonable consideration at that session of any administrative details that might improve the present methods designed for the protection of all citizens in the complete and equal exercise of the right and power of the suffrage at such elections. But with my views, both of the constitutionality and of the value of the existing laws, I cannot approve any measure for their repeal except in connection with the enactment of other legislation which may reasonably be expected to afford wiser and more efficient safeguards for free and honest congressional elections.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 29, 1879.

[The reading of the sentence, closing with the words "this election of 1876 will stand as a monument of what good faith, honest endeavor, legal forms, and just authority may do for the protection of the electoral franchise," was greeted with derisive laughter on the democratic side, followed by applause on the republican side, and cries of "Read that again." At the conclusion of the reading there were hearty demonstrations of applause on the republican side.]

Mr. ATKINS. I ask that the House now proceed to the reconsideration of the bill as prescribed by the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass this bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President? This question, according to the requirements of the Constitution, must be taken by yeas and nays. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 93, not voting 78; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. ATKINS. As the message of the President contains objections to certain proposed legislation in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, I think it would be proper to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary. I move that the message be referred to that committee, with leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise, and that it be printed; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the message was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF RECORD.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a question of personal privilege. It is a matter distasteful to me to take up any part of the time of this House on a question of privilege; and if it concerned myself alone I would forego the doing of it. When the bill authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue 5 per cent. bonds was before the House on yesterday, I, among others, took occasion to make some remarks in relation to it. On examination I find that every statement in that report is the contrary of what I did say. So far as those remarks are concerned, they are a matter of no great moment. My object in rising is to call the attention of the Speaker and of this House to the method of reporting the proceedings of this body. I remember, sir, as far back as the Forty-fourth Congress, and from that time until now, abuses of this sort. On one occasion especially, when the Navy appropriation bill had been discussed for several days in this House, on taking up the RECORD I found myself incorrectly reported all the way through. Judging from the report in the RECORD, the remarks appeared to have been made by one who had come from an insane asylum or a bar-room rather than by a member of this House. I was mortified by it. Complaining of it to Mr. Hale, of Maine, then a member of this House, he laughed very heartily, and said he also had been subjected to the same thing and had been made to say that the Secretary of the Navy had spent during the preceding year one and a half millions of dollars for whisky.

During the last Congress, while the Post-Office appropriation bill was before the House, I was made to say that the expenses for railway mail transportation for the preceding year had increased over those of the year preceding at the rate of 500 per cent. I simply give this as an illustration. The errors were numerous, running all the way through.

Now, sir, it is almost impossible for a gentleman having charge of a bill running through days, and perhaps through weeks, to take up the RECORD and rewrite his speeches. Furthermore, it is proper that the other branch of this Congress should have correct information as to the facts upon which this House is acting in legislating, just as we examine the debates of that body to make use of the information we get from that quarter. But if this method of reporting is to obtain all this is worse than useless. It were better, sir, that we were not reported at all if we are to be falsely reported.

Now, sir, I make this complaint with the view of calling the attention of the members of the House, and especially of the Speaker of the House, to these facts. These debates are not only important to the reputation of the gentlemen here, but they are important as a matter of history.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to say I am well aware myself from personal experience of occasional deficiencies in this work; and I make a suggestion, now that the matter is up, partly for the benefit of the Committee on Rules. I have found that the one trouble in the matter is that the corps of reporters, comprising able, excellent, and well-qualified men, is comparatively without organization. There should be a captain of that company, with authority. The lack of that I find to be a fundamental error in the system as it exists at present, and I think the Committee on Rules could remedy that.

Mr. FORT. There is so much noise in the House that I wonder the reporters can get down anything correctly.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is what is the matter.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to announce to the House and to my colleague from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that this subject is now before the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that the House come to order that we may have an opportunity to hear what is being said.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order. Gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and my colleague [Mr. BLOUNT] that this subject is now before the Committee on Rules and I trust that at an early day a report will be made to remedy all this evil.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to correct the report of my remarks yesterday and will do so, if there be no objection, so as to make it correspond to what I did say. And I desire to say further I have borne this as other members have done for a long time, but I shall not rest for one till this matter is corrected.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I think the reporters of this House do wonderfully well in getting the speeches reported as correctly as they do. In my judgment they are the poorest-paid and hardest-worked class of officers there is about this House. I have been a member of this House for more than four years; and while I have not made so many speeches as the gentleman from Georgia and some other gentlemen here, I can say that I have never found a single one of my speeches inaccurately reported. I have taken the trouble, it is true, after I have said anything, to revise the notes of the reporters; and but very few times have I had any occasion to make any correction in the notes submitted to me. As the reporters cannot be heard here to speak for themselves, I think it is but a matter of justice to say this much in their behalf. It is utterly impossible at times for any one to take down correctly what is said here. The confusion and noise that prevail here, the number of gentlemen seeking the floor at the same time, and the number speaking at the same time, make it a matter of wonder and amazement to me that the reporters have succeeded in getting down intelligibly at all what is said here.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman undertake to say that that is the reason and the only reason why our speeches here are not correctly reported?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I do not say that is the only reason, but it is one reason which has presented itself to my mind why we are not always correctly reported.

Mr. BLOUNT. I want to say that there are other reasons, and one of them is incompetency.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then the gentleman ought to state what that reason is, in justice to the other reporters.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have stated that it is incompetency; that is what is the matter.

Mr. EWING. Does the gentleman mean that the entire corps is incompetent?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not.

Mr. EWING. Some member of the corps?

Mr. BLOUNT. Some member of the corps.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to say this, and it is substantially what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] has already said, and I say it in defense of the reporters. Take the present exhibition here upon this floor within the last five minutes, and tell me what mortal man can report correctly what is being said here. It is beyond human possibility. It is because there is so much disorder here, and we ourselves make that disorder, that the reporters fail to make a correct report of the speeches.

Mr. FORT. There are too many talking here at once.

Mr. PRICE. I have been here now for nearly ten years.

Mr. FORT. There are too many talking at once; that is what is the trouble.

Mr. PRICE. There now; how can the reporters get that down; it is impossible for them to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. There are five or six speaking at once here.

Mr. AIKEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the report to be read.

Mr. HUMPHREY. We ought to have a photographer here.

Mr. PRICE. I think that in justice to the reporters no imputation upon either their competency, their honesty, or their skill ought to be placed upon the records of this House.

Mr. AIKEN. I want to know what there is before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is a privileged question before the House.

Mr. AIKEN. What is that question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] rose to a privileged question, to correct the RECORD.

Mr. AIKEN. Will not the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] be allowed to make that correction without so much interference?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will be kind enough to be seated, and the House will come to order.

Mr. AIKEN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PRICE. I have said about all I intended to say in reference to this matter. I rose only to speak a word for the reporters who have no chance to defend themselves on this floor. In that connection, I want to say that I have been here for nearly ten years, and I have sometimes had occasion to take the floor, though not very often. When I have done so, I have generally taken occasion, because I know that I speak more rapidly than a man ought to speak when addressing a deliberative body, to examine the report of the remarks which I have made. I desire to say that I have been utterly astonished to find that these reporters have been able to report them so accurately as they do. I think this ought to be said in justice to the reporters.

Mr. BLOUNT. One word more, in view of what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] has said. He would seem to intimate that what I have said is unjust to the reporters. I want to say that I am as far from doing injustice to any of those gentlemen as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] can be. And I desire to add that the great body of the reports of the proceedings of this House are made with wonderful accuracy.

Mr. PRICE. That is all right.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now in regard to the body of the reporters, I have as much to say in commendation of them as the gentleman from Iowa. But I do know that some person connected with that corps does report as erroneously almost as it is possible for it to be done.

Mr. PRICE. Let me say that I do not mean any imputation upon the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that the gentleman does not make any imputations upon me. But I rose in this House for the purpose of saying what I thought was due to the House and to the country, that our proceedings should be correctly reported. And I do not mean to be diverted from this matter by any intimation from any quarter. The object can be reached, and I intend to reach it in some way.

Mr. AIKEN. I call for the regular order.

COMMITTEE CHANGES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks consent to make at this time the following announcement of changes upon committees:

W. F. SLEMONS, of Arkansas, in place of A. A. CLARK, of New Jersey, on the Committee for the District of Columbia;

A. A. CLARK, of New Jersey, in place of W. F. SLEMONS, of Arkansas, on the Committee of Elections; and

J. FLOYD KING, of Louisiana, in place of R. L. GIBSON, of Louisiana, declined, on the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. Leave of absence is requested in the followirg cases:

Mr. LINDSEY, for fifteen days from the 1st of June;

Mr. ORTH, for ten days from the 4th of June;

Mr. BRIGHAM, for Saturday and Monday next;

Mr. MORSE, indefinitely, on account of important business; and

Mr. LADD, for fifteen days from the 1st of June.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I object to granting leave of absence to any member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also asks leave of absence for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] for two weeks, in order that they may attend to public duties elsewhere. The Chair will state that these gentlemen have been appointed under the law Visitors to the West Point Academy, and they desire to be absent from the House in order to attend to their duties in that capacity. [Cries of "All right!"] The Chair hears no objection to the request in behalf of these two gentlemen, and leave of absence is granted.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask leave of absence for my colleague [Mr. FORT] for ten days, on account of sickness.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] as I understand, withdraws his motion to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

SUBSIDIARY COINAGE.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes. I desire to move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. The Senate, as gentlemen know, has cut down the legal-tender quality of the fractional currency from $20 to $10. I hope the House will non-concur and let us have a committee of conference.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think it is best to take what we have offered to us by the Senate. "Half a loaf is better than no bread." The country needs this bill; and I hope the House will concur in all the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. The country does not need the remaining portions of the bill half so much as it needs the part to which I have referred.

Mr. STEPHENS. I call the previous question on the motion to concur.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. EWING. I ask that the amendments of the Senate be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, strike out the words "fractional or subsidiary."

In line 10, after the word "coin," insert "of the United States of smaller denominations than $1."

In line 11, strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

Strike out section 4.

Amend the title by striking out the word "twenty" and inserting the word "ten."

Mr. EWING. I ask that the bill as amended by the Senate be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the holder of any of the silver coin of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 may, on presentation of the same in sums of $20 or any multiple thereof, at the office of the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States, receive therefor lawful money of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States who may receive any coins under the provisions of this act shall exchange the same in sums of $20, or any multiple thereof, for lawful money of the United States on demand of any holder thereof.

SEC. 3. The present silver coin of the United States of smaller denominations than $1 shall hereafter be a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10, in full payment of all dues, public and private.

SEC. 4 [5]. That all laws or parts of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask that the fourth section, which the Senate has struck out, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all coins of every description of the United States of the face value of twenty-five cents and under, shall be received at all post-offices for payment of postage, or the purchase of postage-stamps, in any sums not exceeding $3.

Mr. STEPHENS. That section which the Senate has struck out I would prefer to retain; but I think we had better take what the Senate offers rather than delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will allow debate on the other side of the proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move the previous question.

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman debates his side of the question and does not allow anybody else to say anything.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] will be heard by the Chair as long as the gentleman from Georgia was heard.

Mr. MILLS. I will simply say that I regard this as a bill to relieve men who in New York and other cities have large quantities of this fractional currency, which at present they cannot get rid of because it lacks the legal-tender quality. This bill will compel the Government to accept this fractional currency in exchange for legal-tender money; but it provides no means by which the Government may get this currency out of its vaults, because it has no legal-tender quality.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being—ayes 24, noes 127, less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

The motion of Mr. STEPHENS to concur in the amendments of the Senate was then agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSE. Is there not a motion to adjourn pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] has moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ACKLEN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] having made a motion that the House adjourn over to-morrow, and a motion to reconsider that vote having been laid on the table, it is not in order now to move that the House adjourn till Monday, for the House has already decided that when it adjourns it will adjourn to meet on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. This motion does not interfere with the execution of that order; it merely proposes to adjourn to another day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] is not the regular order, but that the regular order is the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would inquire of the Chair how the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut can be voted on unless the vote by which the House agreed to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] be reconsidered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that point already.

Mr. HAWLEY. My motion proposes to do the same thing, and more too.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is that motion in order when the regular order is demanded?

The SPEAKER. This is the regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The regular order is the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, pending this motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 109, nays 104, not voting 72; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SLEMONS. My colleague, Mr. DUNN, is paired with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio.

Mr. MULDROW. I am paired with Mr. DWIGHT, of New York.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, is paired with Mr. MCCOOK, of New York.

Mr. FORNEY. My colleague, Mr. SHELLEY, is paired with Mr. CAMP, of New York.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. COWGILL. If he were here, I should vote "ay."

Mr. DAVIDSON. My colleague, Mr. HULL, who is absent by leave of the House, is paired with Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois.

Mr. BOUCK. I am paired with Mr. MCKINLEY, of Ohio. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. HOSTETLER. I am paired with Mr. GARFIELD. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. MONROE. Mr. GARFIELD is paired with Mr. HOSTETLER, Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, with Mr. WARNER, and Mr. KEIFER with Mr. ROTHWELL.

Mr. HARMER. Mr. WASHBURN is paired with Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey.

Mr. ROBESON. I am paired with Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, is paired with Mr. DUNN.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. DICK is paired with Mr. LAY.

Mr. BOYD. My colleague, Mr. ALDRICH, is paired with Mr. HULL.

Mr. COX. I am paired with Mr. MORTON, of New York.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion to adjourn, made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN VOORHIS.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I hope the motion to adjourn will be withdrawn until I can make a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference only.

Objection was made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the motion to adjourn.

The question was put on the motion to adjourn; and the Speaker decided by the sound that it seemed to be carried in the affirmative.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were ayes 22.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number.

Mr. SCALES. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 22.

The SPEAKER. Not a sufficient number; and tellers are not ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Count the other side.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done on tellers, but the Chair will ask for the other side on ordering the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 142.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the vote on adjournment the Chair will submit some requests to the House. Mr. DICK requests indefinite leave of absence from June 1, on account of sickness; Mr. MULLER, for six days, on account of important business; and Mr. BRIGHAM, for Saturday and Monday, on account of sickness in his family. Is there objection to these several requests? The Chair hears no objection and the requests are accordingly granted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the vote been taken on the adjournment?

The SPEAKER. The vote has been taken by sound.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I want a division.

Mr. HOUSE. I object to a division. The Speaker has decided the question.

Mr. COX. The record will show.

The SPEAKER. The vote was taken, or otherwise the demand for yeas and nays and tellers on the yeas and nays would not have been considered by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. But the other side was not counted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit it again.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 129, noes 27.

So the motion was agreed to.

A. S. BLOOM.

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in the case of A. S. Bloom, no adverse report having been made.

The House then (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) adjourned until Monday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLISS: The petition of John B. Wolff, for the amendment of the law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the recovery of confederate assets, and for the repeal of the statute of limitations—to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

By Mr. CARLISLE: The petition of citizens of Kentucky, for the establishment of an additional judicial district in said State—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COX: Papers relating to the war claim of J. A. Richardson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HUMPHREY: The petition of Frederick Degelow, for the extension of a patent for an improvement in graining instruments—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. HURD: The petition of H. D. & H. S. Waldbridge, for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 845) relating to the revision of assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia—to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee: The petition of William H. Walker, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 2, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

ELEVATORS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of May, 1879, the synopsis of bids and the report of a board of experts on the subject of elevators for public buildings in Chicago and elsewhere, with a letter of the Supervising Architect transmitting the same; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of L. M. Shumaker, of Danville, Virginia, praying for the passage of a law granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it without amendment and with the recommendation that it be passed. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A bill can only be considered in the morning hour, before the routine morning business is concluded, by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let us hear what it is, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be reported.

The Secretary read the bill by its title.

Mr. ROLLINS. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session and was not concurred in by the House. The House has now passed the bill and sent it here. It is very important that it should be acted upon.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It can be called up at any other time. There are several other bills that ought to be taken up that are first on the Calendar, and I think this had better go over and come up in its regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present consideration of the bill is objected to, and it will be placed on the Calendar.

ACCOUNTS OF ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 491) for the relief of Cyrus Thomas, disbursing agent of the United States entomological commission, have instructed me to report it with an amendment. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill, explaining that it is simply to allow two of the officers of the United States entomological commission to settle their accounts which are now pending in the United States Treasury Department, and which have been delayed because they inadvertently omitted to take the oath of office in the time the law prescribed. It is a matter of convenience, I may say, to the Department, as well as justice to the gentlemen involved, that the bill should be passed.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert in lieu:

That the accounts of the salaries and disbursement of the United States entomological commission may be settled and allowed in the same manner and with the same effect as if the members and officers thereof had taken the oath required by law at the time they entered upon the performance of their duties: Provided, They shall have taken said oaths before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1879.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The title ought to be amended now. It ought to read "A bill in relation to the accounts of the United States entomological commission," I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the title will be so amended.

MONUMENT TO COLONEL M'COOK.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask leave, without previous notice, to introduce a bill, and after its title has been read I shall ask that the Senate proceed immediately to its consideration.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned ordnance for the monument of Colonel Robert L. McCook, Ninth Ohio Volunteers, in Washington Park, in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio; which was read the first time by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be read the second time at length.

The bill was read the second time, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be authorized to furnish to the proper parties, out of ordnance and ordnance stores belonging to the United States of patterns not now in use, the following, to be used in the railing around the public monument erected to the memory of Colonel Robert L. McCook, of the Ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, in Washington Park, in the city of Cincinnati, to wit:

One hundred and forty muskets and bayonets;
Four twelve-inch smooth-bore siege-guns or rifles of like size;
Four ten-inch spherical shot or shell;
Twelve thirty-two-pound shot or shell.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that before we pass any more bills of this kind we ought to have some information from the Department showing whether there is in fact any condemned ordnance that ought to be disposed of in this way. I know that such demands are made from day to day, and yet they are a very large expense to the country, because the condemned ordnance is the raw material from which other ordnance might be constructed, and it is very expensive. Before this bill is acted upon, I hope the Senator from Ohio will ascertain whether in fact there is any condemned ordnance at the present time that is suitable for this purpose.

Mr. PENDLETON. I had anticipated a possible objection of that kind, and have informed myself by application to the Department that there is material of this kind, ordnance, shell, and shot, of a pattern that cannot now possibly be used, and that this demand can be supplied without any expense to the Government except the use of old material which has been condemned and is now useless. Otherwise I should not have made the request that the bill be considered now.

I hold in my hand a communication, not from the Secretary of War, but from a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the condition of the arms of the Government, a gentleman in Government employ, to the effect which I have stated to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the error that all these bills contain is that we do not have any provision in them to secure the ultimate application of this material to the object to which it is devoted. I have no reason to suppose, from any information I have, that any of the thousands of bills of this kind have provided cast-iron, bronze, &c., for anybody that was not ultimately applied to the very patriotic and honorable purpose for which it was designed. At the same time a Government that pays out of its Treasury money (because that is what it comes to) value——

Mr. PENDLETON. It has been paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes. A government which does that ought to have some means in the bills themselves that the department could execute, of seeing that the ordnance is actually devoted to that use, instead of being taken by some supposed committee of some body of soldiers and turned over, and then if they cannot raise money enough afterward to finish up the operation they may sell out and pocket the proceeds. When I say that, I wish to repeat that I have no knowledge or information which leads me to suspect that in any case that has occurred; but at the same time anybody can see that it might occur. Any body of people who were not particularly soldiers and who had not any special cemetery or grave that they wished to ornament, in that way could get a bill through here according to the practice for years past, (and I am not making any criticism upon this measure at all,) to appropriate cannon and ordnance for a grave-yard somewhere. We all vote for it the moment it is reported, and we never inquire about it afterward, and nobody else does. Somebody presents the proper papers to the War Department and gets an order for the ordnance. Whether that person is really the person for whom the bill was passed we do not know and the War Department does not know.

I should be glad, therefore, (because I am in favor of all this sort of thing,) if some means could be devised in every one of the bills, beginning with this for instance, requiring the Secretary of War to see to it that the ordnance granted in this way should continue to be the property of the Government until it was actually placed where it was designed to go, and that of course in case of any diversion would follow the property, and in case of a wrong it could be rectified. But at the same time in this particular instance I am not going to do more than to point out the possibilities of blunder that sometimes may exist. I am not going to object.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will say in reply——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PENDLETON. I intended to say, in reply to the Senator from Vermont, simply that this monument is in memory of General McCook, a name which is certainly well known to all the people of the country, a gentleman that the President pro tempore of the Senate as well as myself knew intimately well. He died during the war. A monument has been erected by the Ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and stands in one of the public places of Cincinnati. It was dedicated more than a year ago. The original design was that it should be surrounded with ornaments of this kind, and now application is made by a proper officer of his, in behalf of the committee who had charge of the raising of the funds that erected this monument and paid for it out of those funds, to make this appropriation at this session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That makes a satisfactory case entirely.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KIRKWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 645) to authorize Martin V. Nichols to establish and maintain a ferry across the Missouri River at Brulé City, in Dakota Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ROLLINS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 646) to provide for the protection of attorneys doing business before the Patent Office and the other bureaus and Departments of the Government; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 108) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

ELECTIONS IN RHODE ISLAND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no "concurrent and other resolutions" the business before the Senate is the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] on the 27th of May to refer to the select committee to inquire into alleged frauds in the late election so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene, of Rhode Island, as relates to the interference of Federal officers in the late election in that State.

Mr. MCMILLAN. As the Senator from Indiana who introduced the resolution is not in his seat, in his absence I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1152.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to proceed to the consideration of the bill he has named.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to that motion at all, but as I have in my hand an amendment which I propose to offer to the resolution when it comes up, I will ask the liberty to submit it now that it may be printed. I send it to the Secretary's desk to be read and printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Maine will be received and read.

Mr. BLAINE. I move it as an additional resolution by way of amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To add.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Resolved further, That inasmuch as the third, sixth, and eighth congressional districts of Georgia, the sixth and eighth districts of North Carolina, and the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth districts of Mississippi cast at the last election an aggregate vote of only 39,571, almost entirely for candidates of the democratic party; and inasmuch as at the preceding election in 1876 the candidates of the republican party in these same districts received an aggregate vote of 59,739, the said committee is instructed to inquire whether within these districts or any one of them there was fraud or undue influence practiced against citizens at the late election, or whether there was a denial of the right to vote to any citizens of the United States who are also citizens of the States, respectively, named herein. And that in making these inquiries the committee shall have the right to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that amendment and ask that it be printed, so that it may be pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to debate the question of postponing the resolution, and therefore I suppose I am in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to postpone the resolution and take up the bill moved by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the resolution is postponed, to which I shall ultimately have no objection, as I see the chairman of the select committee is present, I wish to call his attention and that of the Senate to the fact that there appears printed, as apparently under the order of the committee, a little pamphlet-like thing called "part 3," if I recollect aright, some part or all of which relates to certain transactions alleged to have taken place at Bennington in the State of Vermont in the year 1878.

I wish in this public presence to urgently request that committee in the performance of its duty to take an early opportunity to investigate the matters alleged in that paper, because if the matters alleged in the paper are entirely true and are all the truth, somebody ought to be punished for misconduct. At any rate, inasmuch as this paper number 3, as it is called, laid before the committee, has been printed and made public, the Senate and the public ought to be informed what the whole truth respecting the election at Bennington was. I think from the papers as they are in print (and that is all I know about them) that matter relates entirely to a State election, but I am not sure about that. It may have been a congressional election as well; but whether State or congressional, for the purposes of information I do not want the committee to forget to attend to any misdeeds that are supposed to have occurred by anybody in the State of Vermont.

While I am up, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the somewhat odd way that seems to have been adopted of pushing out to public gaze, so that the public prints make use of them as established facts found by a committee, the incomplete and one-sided statements that are made to a committee, charges in the form of affidavits, communications, &c., and before there is any answer to them or any investigation of them. It does not appear to me that that is a fair way of enlightening the public judgment or seeking after truth. I admit there are a good many ways of enlightening public judgment and of seeking after truth; but if anybody wanted to get up a dishonest political campaign, wanted to palm off upon people who had not full means of information one-sided statements, charges, affidavits, &c., that have never been sifted, as facts that had been found by the Senate of the United States or some committee of it—if there were any such person, as there cannot be, one of the courses that that person would take would be to persuade a committee of the Senate to have the papers, as fast as they were filed, printed and made public, and have them marked on the outside as a part of the official proceedings of the committee, and then have them cut up into little sections so that each one would be by itself, so that nobody who should take up the paper could tell whether it had been acted upon or not; and then to have favorable newspapers, or those who were imposed upon, no matter which, all over the country put that forth as the result of an investigation that had found out the truth, instead of being what it merely is when you look in this paper to which I refer, and know the history of it, the statement of one side of a case, real or fabricated, no matter which, (whether sincere or not, it makes no difference,) that has not been investigated or tried or reported.

I do not think, Mr. President, that the cause of public honesty in political affairs is subserved by that species of publication. I saw only a day or two ago in a New England newspaper of large circulation a statement to the effect (I give the purport and substance of it) that this select committee had found that certain most extraordinary and wicked transactions had gone on, I believe, in the State of Massachusetts respecting a recent election, wherein the members of a particular party and its organized agents had been guilty of most astounding oppression and wickedness in respect of bringing coercion to bear upon certain humble and comparatively defenseless classes of community in relation to an election. When I saw it I happened to remember that I had heard exposed in this very Senate the circumstance that that particular paper was an absolute forgery; that rewards had been offered to find the author of it, and all that.

Mr. DAWES. I wish the Senator would also state that that very forged paper stood on the front of the document which the Senator is commenting on, and that it was laid on all our tables as a public document printed by order of the Senate, and a pile of copies of it was in this Chamber for distribution by every one who desired it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What I rose for was to call the attention of the chairman of the select committee to that part of the investigation which relates to the State of Vermont and to urge immediate and complete investigation of the subject. All that I wish to add is that so far as I represent the people of the State of Vermont of both parties, and I do represent both parties in every just sense, the taxpayers, I do not think there is any one of them of any party there who wishes to pay, as they have to pay, for printing that kind of literature to be circulated as official findings of the Senate of the United States of facts until the truth turns out to be so.

I wish to say that I believe it is contrary to all the previous proper practice of the Senate to proceed at the public expense to make public charges and accusations of this character as come under titles on the outside of them that appear to make them authorized versions of something that has taken place.

Mr. VOORHEES and Mr. WALLACE rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, inasmuch as I am up and do not intend to take any time—if I did I should yield at once to my friend from Pennsylvania—I propose merely to suggest that my colleague [Mr. MCDONALD] is called away and is to-day in Chicago in connection with a very important professional engagement in court, and will be here certainly by Thursday morning if no accident happens; and as this matter seems to be widening in its tendencies I suggest and, if it becomes necessary, will move that it be laid over until he returns.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now pending is to postpone.

Mr. VOORHEES. I was out and was not aware of it. I did not know that such a motion had been made.

Mr. WALLACE. I rise to say simply that when the committee at the beginning of the extra session changed front, as Senators will remember it did, there were found in the possession of the committee certain documents and papers, which had been called for by the committee from a leading member of this body on this side of the Chamber and submitted by him to the committee on its request. They came into the possession of the committee as a part of its records. They had not been printed; no notice had been taken of them. All the testimony, affidavits and otherwise, that had been taken in the Southern States had been printed. These papers were before us; something was to be done with them; and at the suggestion of one of the members of the committee a resolution of the Senate was obtained to print the papers thus laid before the committee, not what have been obtained since, but those that came into the possession of the committee and were found in their custody, those that had come there in pursuance of a request upon the Senator to whom I refer. They were taken and published, by order of the Senate, as the Senator from Vermont states; they contain certain charges in reference to his State, certain charges in reference to the State of Massachusetts, and certain other charges. Whether they were truthful or not I do not pretend to say. The committee have made no examination or investigation of the charges contained in these papers. The papers were printed for the convenience of the committee and in order that we might not be compelled to go over all these manuscripts in detail, but that we might have them in convenient form. There were but about one hundred copies of these papers printed. They were used in the Senate and by the committee, just as all other testimony is used which is printed in advance of the report of a committee. This is not any new practice; testimony taken in the Southern States has been printed in advance of the report of a committee. That is always the case. So these papers that were laid before the committee were printed in advance of any report and in advance of any investigation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend has missed the point, which leads me to interrupt him with his consent. The point I made was not that papers might not be printed, as I believe the order of the Senate was, for the use of the committee—that is convenient and necessary, I agree—but that as I understood the Senate resolution, though I may be wrong about it, they were ordered to be printed for the use of the committee. If that was so, it was right, and only the necessary number of copies should have been printed for that use; but in fact in some way they were printed for publication and were laid upon the tables of Senators. I have no knowledge on any previous occasion of any testimony or papers laid before a committee during the time before the Senate and its committees had changed front, that were made public until after the report of the committee, so that all sides had had a chance to be heard.

Mr. WALLACE. Nothing else was done in this case than has been done in reference to every case, the simple printing of the testimony. If there were copies of these papers placed before Senators and on their desks, it is nothing but what has been always done in the past. Senators can always obtain——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. WALLACE. Let me finish my sentence. Senators can always obtain at the document-room copies of the testimony, and they find on their desks or at their desks copies of the testimony taken in all cases.

Mr. DAWES. Let me make an inquiry. Does the Senator speak of the document in reference to Massachusetts as testimony?

Mr. WALLACE. I speak of the papers laid before the committee as being printed under the order of the Senate for the use of the committee and the Senate, as the order was. It is not testimony.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator spoke of it as testimony. I was anxious to inquire what designation of that paper he had been able to ascertain for it.

Mr. WALLACE. I say nothing was printed but the papers that came into the hands of the committee when the extra session began. They were printed upon an order of the Senate for the use of the committee; and I shall be very glad indeed to do anything that I can to remove any false impression that may have gotten out through the newspapers for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. THURMAN, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Mr. President, I know nothing whatever of the papers that have been referred to; I mean the print that has been referred to. I do know something, I suppose, from the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, in regard to some of those papers, but I did not know that they had been printed. I knew nothing whatever of that until the Senator from Vermont called our attention to it this morning. I have not seen one of the printed copies, and I do not rise to speak about that; but I was a little surprised at the defect of memory of my friend from Vermont in saying that the evidence of these investigating committees had never been published in advance of the report of the committee, if I understood him aright. Why, Mr. President, when that celebrated ku-klux committee went South, perambulating that country, and made up, I believe, seven volumes, seven large octavo volumes, of one kind of material and another called testimony, I think there was not one week during their perambulations in the South, and perhaps not three days, that the press did not teem with what purported to be testimony taken before that committee. I tried in this Senate before that committee went South and when the subject-matter was before the Senate to prevent that thing being done. I tried to prevent testimony being sent out from time to time, and I denounced it then as an electioneering document during the political campaign that was about to take place. No attention was paid to my remonstrance, and they went South on their way and from time to time—as often as once a week I am sure—I saw flaming articles in the newspapers embodying what purported to be testimony taken by that committee to prove that no man in the southern country, if he was a republican, held his life safe for one moment. That on examination will be found to be so. "Wait for the report," we are told. That committee did not make their report until long afterward. They made their report when Congress met, and not till some time after Congress did meet, but hundreds of pages of this testimony were published in the newspapers of this country and used as electioneering matter long before that committee made their report. I speak of that celebrated committee that printed six, seven, or eight volumes which have been consigned to oblivion for the last five or six or seven years—thirteen my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] says. I do not know but that there were thirteen. Nobody ever read them; they overdid the work. The Senator from Kentucky was a member of that committee, and he knows whether my statement is correct. There was culled, selected matter printed in the New York papers, many of the statements telegraphed to New York papers and printed day after day, out of which good points were made to tell in the elections. I am not defending the practice at all. If my memory is not at fault, I think I can turn to the debate on the appointment of that committee, and I shall be found there recorded as having most strongly condemned any such thing, saying that it ought not be done, denouncing it as an attempt to make political capital in a political campaign that was then about to commence. I thought so then.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question just there?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Did not the honorable Senator from Ohio lend all the influence of his name in the Senate toward having the committee hold their sessions with open doors, and against even permitting them to have the discretion of keeping anything private? Did not the honorable Senator support that proposition vigorously, insisting that everything should be done openly? Of course when that was done, everything would be telegraphed hither and yon; either side, whichever happened to get the advantage, would take care to present what occurred to its benefit——

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to answer the Senator's question. He has asked me a question. I prefer to answer it at once.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know whether I moved that that committee should sit with open doors or not; but if any such motion was made, I certainly voted for it, for I never have voted for any star-chamber inquisition since I have held a seat in the Senate. I would no more try a whole people in the dark than I would try one man in the dark; and, therefore, if there is any vote recorded upon that question, I am quite sure it will be found that I voted in favor of open sessions. But I think this: the Senator will find that if any such proposition was made it was voted down; and I think the Senator will find further that when the democrats on that committee moved before the committee itself that it should sit with open doors, they were voted down too.

Mr. BLAINE. Without regard to that, I will state also that so far as the dispatches came in regard to proclamations of which the Senator has spoken, the notorious perversions of fact, not shown by the testimony at all, came from the city of Charleston when the committee were in session there, absolutely perverting and stating that which had not been stated before the committee. I am not at all arraigning any member of the committee; I suppose no member of the committee was in the least degree guilty of it; but when the Senator speaks about flaming proclamations, there may have been flaming proclamations made in the interest of the republican party, but I insist they were based on what had been sworn in testimony before the committee. But the flaming proclamations that came from Charleston were proclamations that had nothing whatever to stand upon in the testimony before the committee and were an utter perversion both of the facts and the testimony.

Mr. THURMAN. This is the first time I ever heard of that bomb-shell from Charleston. I have heard of some other bomb-shells that stirred up a good deal of trouble in this country, but this bomb-shell I never heard of before.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not represent it as a bomb-shell; it was perfectly innocuous.

Mr. THURMAN. Allow me to proceed, as we have but a very few minutes. If there were such misrepresentation of what took place before the committee, it is a strong reason why the proceedings of the committee should have been open, for then there could have been no such misrepresentation. I am quite sure that I was always in favor of open sessions. But what I complained of in respect to that ku-klux committee that took those twelve or thirteen volumes of testimony was that while they could sit with closed doors, get portions of the testimony from time to time, and that which bore most hard against the political opponents of the majority of that committee found its way into the public press weekly, if not daily.

Now, I wish once more to be understood, I am not defending any such practice at all. I opposed it in that instance, and I am willing to oppose it again. I am willing that these investigations shall be made, however, with open doors. I think it is nothing but right that they should be, because, as I said, I will not try a whole people, and I will not try a whole party, in secret, any more than I would so try one man. If the sessions be held with open doors, then the publication of the testimony is inevitable, it becomes public, and everybody can answer it as soon as it appears.

Mr. DAWES. Before the Senator from Ohio takes his seat I should like to have him, as the Senate is indebted to him, I believe, for that false and forged document which stands upon the first page of this printed document—of course the Senator himself is not responsible for the forgery—tell the Senate the source through which it came to him. If he would do so it would enable us in Massachusetts, perhaps, to trace it to its origin.

Mr. THURMAN. I will answer the Senator. I do not know whether that forged document ever was in my hands or not. I do not know whether it ever went from me to the committee or not. This I know:

I offered an amendment to the resolution of investigation that was presented extending the scope of the investigation. After the committee was formed one of the first things they did was to address a letter to the mover of the original resolution, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] calling on him for information as to the matters which he asked to have investigated by his original resolution, and at the same time they addressed a similar letter to me asking me for information in regard to the matters embraced in my amendment to his resolution. The Senator from Maine answered the committee, referring them to divers sources of information. I treated them with the same politeness, and referred them to all the sources of information that came to me; and as people began to pour in information until it became very inconvenient, I was very glad when the committee got fairly at work and enabled me to relieve myself of the load of papers that were sent to me, and most of which, without even reading, I sent to the committee.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator, then, cannot give us any information as to how he came by that paper?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know that I ever saw it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think all the papers referred to by the Senator from Vermont were communicated to the Teller committee, as it was called at that time, by the Senator from Ohio. I think he must also at the same time have communicated those papers to the newspapers. The committee at the time they received the most of those papers were in New Orleans, and they saw them in the newspapers before the original manuscript papers were received by the chairman of the committee in New Orleans. So far as the publication of the matter is concerned it was published long before it was ordered to be printed by the present chairman of that committee.

Mr. THURMAN. The letter of the Senator from Maine in answer to the call of the committee appeared in the papers, and of course my letters to the committee appeared in the papers in the same way. They all went there.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All I wish to say is that the Senator from Ohio is mistaken in imputing to me an error when I said the course had been hitherto not to print the testimony until the report came in in order that it all might be printed together, and that the benefits of cross-examination and counter-testimony might all go together in the fair way. I do not think he can find any order of the Senate, until this body convened, that would justify his impression that he has stated. He supposes that it must be so because the ku-klux committee at Charleston pursuing certain investigations were reported in the newspapers as having ascertained certain things. It is reported in the newspapers, Mr. President, that the Senate in executive session does and says certain things, while we all know that Senators are not responsible for those reports. We must know it. We all know that frequently they are entirely untrue. We all know that the rules of the Senate absolutely prohibit it and sentence any Senator to expulsion who is guilty of disclosing. Therefore it does not do to say that because newspapers reported what they professed was testimony or information taken before or obtained by the ku-klux committee in Charleston, either the Senate or the committee were responsible for it. What I am criticising is the fact that the committee itself in this instance, not the newspapers, has with certain headings and title-pages laid upon the tables of the Senate, under the authority of the Senate I admit, but under the authority of this Senate, which is the new departure, the change of front, that I am speaking of—because I have got the resolution now—has done the thing that the Senator from Ohio condemns and condemns rightly, and which was never done to my knowledge before.

There is not any objection to anybody's finding out the truth; but it is quite a difficult thing to find out the truth from this course of proceeding, because we have discovered in the case of Massachusetts that the very first of these papers, the grand headlight of the democratic locomotive—no, I will not say democratic, I did not mean to allude to politics about this—that the grand headlight of this great disclosure, the thing that is to start it off and give it a good send-off, turns out to be a forgery. The committee has not reported yet; but it is confessed now I believe by everybody that it is absolutely a forged paper. I do not think that the papers coming from Vermont are forged papers; but I do say that it is not right, in view of the cause of truth and justice, that papers of that kind, ex parte affidavits, where there is no opportunity for cross-examination as there is when a committee is sitting, with open doors or not with open doors, by different members of the committee putting questions so that when the testimony is then published you have got the witnesses sifted—it is not right that ex parte affidavits gotten up by somebody and usually in such cases signed by somebody who can rarely understand the effect of what has been drawn up by somebody else, should be put off upon the country and circulated through the newspapers as official documents of the Senate representing something that has been ascertained. That is what I wish to call public attention to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The morning hour having expired the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, upon which the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] is entitled to the floor.

IMPROVEMENT OF KANAWHA RIVER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this, the Senate will remember, is the bill upon which my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] evidently on Thursday did not wish to hear me speak. He took occasion then, when I had some observations to make, to adjourn the Senate instantly. I see that Senator is here this morning, and to relieve his apprehension, I will say to him that I do not intend at any length to make observations about this matter. But I remember rising when the bill was reported on Thursday to remind the Senate how far we are going in making appropriations for what are called internal improvements, the improvements of rivers and harbors. Here is a river in the State of West Virginia of such character and dimensions that to traverse it by water-craft it is necessary to erect dams—I believe they are to be movable dams—and to construct locks so as virtually to make an artificial water-channel in and across the State or a part of the State. Then, as supplemental to that, it is proposed that under what the lawyers call among the powers of government the right of eminent domain, the national authority is to go into the State and purchase the land on which to make these erections, purchase it by judicial condemnation unless the owners are ready to part with it at a price which may be agreed upon.

I meant, Mr. President, to make this statement; I make it now, and I presume I shall consult the convenience of the Senate if having made it I desist from all comment on this bill. I did not rise to make any attack upon this particular work as distinguished from other such works, but only to call the attention of the Senate to the point we have reached. I hear Senators speak sometimes of calling the attention of the country to particular facts. I do not flatter myself that I am likely to invoke very general attention in the country, but I do venture to hope that I may attract the attention of members of the Senate to the great length which, as it seems to me, we are going in the name of improving highways of commerce.

I believe, as I have often said, that that power as correctly understood is confined to national highways, to streams in their dimensions and in their location national, to harbors on the seaboard, harbors on the internal seas, for such they are although we call them lakes. I believe it does not extend to the improvement of local streams wholly within States, not even designed by nature to be the channels on which water craft or vehicles may move. I do not believe that it extends to the right to improve private property in any sense whatever; and I believe, as this bill illustrates, that proceeding further and further year by year in recent years, the appropriation of money for these purposes has been carried to a length and consented to in many instances wholly indefensible,—indefensible in respect of the rightful power of Congress and indefensible in respect of the judicious expenditure of money even if our right to make the expenditure were clear.

I understand, Mr. President, particularly as the Senate is now constituted, how very ineffectual any word of mine is likely to be in advancing or retarding proposed legislation; but as I happen to be a member of the committee from which this bill is said to come, I have ventured to detain the Senate for a moment while I asked attention to this as an illustration, a marked illustration it seems to me, of the excess in which the two Houses of Congress have been indulging and in which the House of Representatives in this instance, for this is a House bill, has indulged in this species of legislation.

Mr. HEREFORD. I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but a little while. The Senator from New York says he desires to call the attention of the Senate to how far we are going in the direction of improving what he terms national highways. I do not see how that question arises in this case. This bill is asking the improvement of no river. This bill is not asking the appropriation of a dollar for the improvement of a river. The money has heretofore been appropriated, and this bill is only asking the Senate to allow the Government officers to carry out a work for which an appropriation has been made.

The Senator says that he thinks there can be under the Constitution no appropriation made except for great national highways. I have failed to see in the decisions of the Supreme Court on this subject that they have used the expression "national highways" at all, and I am a little surprised at the position taken by the Senator from New York. It seems to me that he has misconceived the law in this case, and I shall only occupy the time of the Senate a short time to read a little of that law.

I suppose the argument of the Senator is that we are still acting under the doctrine of the common law that the improvement of navigable rivers only applies to those streams where the tide ebbs and flows. That is not the doctrine that has obtained in this country. That is not in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The only inquiry could be, if this were an original question, is this a navigable river within the purview of the Constitution and the decisions made thereunder? Now, let us see what has been decided. The portion on which I rely has been decided time and again, but I will refer to only one case. The Supreme Court of the United States, by Mr. Justice Field, who is, I believe, understood to be a pretty strict constructionist of the Constitution, in the case of The Daniel Ball, in the tenth volume of Wallace's Reports, used this language, to which I draw the attention of the Senator from New York:

> Two questions are presented in this case for our determination:
> First. Whether the steamer was at the time designated in the libel engaged in transporting merchandise and passengers on a navigable water of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress; and Second. Whether those acts are applicable to a steamer engaged as a common carrier between places in the same State, when a porfion of the merchandise transported by her is destined to places in other States, or comes from places without the State, she not running in connection with or in continuation of any line of steamers, or other vessels, or any railway line leading to or from another State.

The Supreme Court discusses the doctrine of the common law on this subject, and says it does not prevail in the United States:

Upon the first of these questions we entertain no doubt. The doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country. Here the ebb and flow of the tide do not constitute the usual test, as in England, or any test at all of the navigability of waters. There no waters are navigable in fact, or at least to any considerable extent, which are not subject to the tide, and from this circumstance tide-water and navigable water there signify substantially the same thing. But in this country the case is widely different. Some of our rivers are as navigable for many hundreds of miles above as they are below the limits of tide-water, and some of them are navigable for great distances by large vessels, which are not even affected by the tide at any point during their entire length. A different test must, therefore, be applied to determine the navigability of our rivers, and that is found in their navigable capacity. Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact. And they are navigable in fact when they are used or are susceptible of being used, in their ordinary condition, as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

The court goes on further to say:

And they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the States, when they form in their ordinary condition by themselves, or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

Now the only point, if this were an original question, would be whether the Kanawha or the Kentucky River forms in its ordinary condition by itself or by uniting with other waters a continuous highway over which commerce is or may be carried.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I see the Senator has closed that book and laid it down; therefore I venture to ask this question: Does he understand from that decision, or infer from it, that the jurist who wrote the opinion intended to say, or to authorize him to say, that because a stream which is navigated is navigable, because a stream which is susceptible of being navigated is navigable, therefore, within the constitutional power we are talking about now, you may take a run, a brook, a water-course, however small, and by artificial means, of locks and dams if you please, bring the water within a channel so narrow as to be deep enough to float a vessel, thus making it an artificial channel, and then maintain what you have done by a decision which says that every stream is a navigable stream which is in fact navigable and every stream is a navigable stream which can be navigated? Unless the Senator means that, he will pardon me for saying that I do not see what possible bearing the decision has upon the point.

Mr. HEREFORD. I mean this: the Supreme Court have decided in other decisions that I have not brought here this morning that if there be a river that connects with other rivers going through more than one State, and if there be rapids in that river, the Government has the power to clear out that rapids, the same power that she has to clear out Hell Gate. Large sums of money have been appropriated for the blowing up of the rocks beneath the river in which Hell Gate is, and they have been blown up. If it be necessary, in other words to confine the waters, it can be done; they may spread over a great width, there may be plenty of water there if it was only confined in the proper channel. The General Government has the power to do that very thing, has the power to utilize the water that is there, just the same as it did at Louisville in the Ohio River. There were rapids opposite the city of Louisville, and the General Government appropriated money to build a canal around them. In that case they did form an artificial channel. In this case there is no necessity nor is it sought to form any artificial channel at all. It is simply to confine the waters that nature has already placed there, so that they may be utilized.

If the argument of the Senator from New York is held to be good, then why improve any river? If there be shoals it cannot be navigated, and therefore you must make no appropriation for that purpose. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] suggests that in the Upper Mississippi we have built a canal seven miles long around the Des Moines Rapids.

I shall not take the trouble to read the decision to which I was about to refer. I will simply read the syllabus, in 11 Wallace, where the Supreme Court held in the case of The Montello:

A river is a navigable water of the United States when it forms, by itself or by its connection with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other States or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

And Mr. Justice Story, the great writer upon the Constitution of the United States, has gone a great deal further than this decision. The expressions made use of by the Senator from New York as to a great national highway find no support in the decisions of this country. The question in this country is, what is a navigable river within the purview of the Constitution, as I have already read from two decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. But what does Mr. Justice Story in the first volume of his Commentaries say:

So far as regards the right to appropriate money to internal improvements generally, the subject has already passed under review in considering the power to lay and collect taxes. The doctrine there contended for, which has been in a great measure borne out by the actual practice of the Government, is, that Congress may appropriate money—

I call the attention of the Senator from New York to this—

Congress may appropriate money not only to clear obstructions to navigable rivers—

That is all that is involved here—to improve harbors, to build breakwaters, to assist navigation—

That is all we seek to do here—to erect forts, light-houses, and piers, and for other purposes allied to some of the enumerated powers; but may also appropriate it in aid of canals—

May build canals to connect one river with another, and we have spent over $10,000,000 on the Fox and Wisconsin River Canal—in aid of canals, roads, and other institutions of a similar nature, existing under State authority.

He goes even as far as that.

The only limitations upon the power are those prescribed by the terms of the Constitution, that the objects shall be for the common defense, or the general welfare of the Union. The true test is, whether the object be of a local character and local use, or whether it be of general benefit to the States. If it be purely local, Congress cannot constitutionally appropriate money for the object. But, if the benefit be general, it matters not, whether in point of locality it be in one State, or several—

It makes no difference whether it be in one State or several—whether it be of large, or of small extent; its nature and character determine the right, and Congress may appropriate money in aid of it; for it is then in a just sense for the general welfare.

The Senate of the United States will take notice of the fact, I presume, that the Kanawha River rises in the State of North Carolina; there it is known as New River; flows through the States of North Carolina, Virginia, and West Virginia until it comes down to a point in West Virginia where the Gauley River empties into it, and from that on it is called the Kanawha. The Kanawha River goes still further down until it empties into the Ohio, and then it is called the Ohio River. This is not a river that has its source and its mouth in the same State. It runs through various States clear to the Gulf of Mexico. The language of the decision of the Supreme Court, which I read a moment ago, is that the test is whether taking the river itself and its various connections it runs through more than one State; and the language that I read from Mr. Justice Story goes even further than that. All this talk about being a great national highway does not find its warrant in the decisions of our courts. The question of making the presence of tide-water the test Mr. Justice Field says does not obtain in this country. The question is whether it is a navigable stream; not a great national highway but a navigable stream within the purview of the Constitution, and this clearly does fall within it according to the decisions I have read. I could take the time of the Senate by reading subsequent decisions in which the court go on in a case like this to say, here is a river that is navigable below a certain point and that is navigable above, and there being falls between the upper and lower parts Congress has the power to clear out those falls, blast out those rocks, make a canal connecting the two, if you please.

Now, a word as to the power of Congress to obtain the title to this property. Congress has that power as an incident to the main thing. If Congress has the power to improve the river, if Congress has the power to build the canal, it certainly has the power, with the consent of the State, to obtain the land on either side, it may be either the land in fee, or simply an easement, or else the appropriation would be of no value whatever. There are many rivers in the Senator's State for which appropriations have been made, for which, under this decision, no appropriation could be made, because they rise in the State of New York and end within the State of New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Will you name one?

Mr. HEREFORD. There are streams in other States, there are streams in many of the States of this Union that rise in a State and flow to a gulf or flow to a lake, and that is the end of them. According to this decision, although many appropriations have been made for them, they would not fall within the doctrine laid down, even if the water of the ocean did flow into them by the ebb and flow of the tide. That has nothing to do with it whatever. It is an exploded doctrine, never maintained in this country.

Then as to obtaining the title, the State of West Virginia by an act of its Legislature has given the power to the General Government for the improvement of a navigable stream to obtain the title to land by condemnation or otherwise. We have in our State, as I suppose there are in all the States, laws providing for the condemnation of private property; and this bill asks to give the power in this case either to obtain this title by voluntary purchase, or if they cannot agree upon the price then a condemnation may take place according to the laws of the State of West Virginia; and that authority, as I said, has been given.

But this question does not arise here at all. I have before me—I will not take the time of the Senate to read it—a letter from the Secretary of War inclosing one from the Chief of Engineers, drawing the attention of Congress through the Committee on Commerce to the necessity of this bill. They say that they think under the appropriation made at the last session they would have the power to go on and expend the money in the improvement of the river, but they doubt whether they have the power to purchase the land on either side for the purpose of building the locks and dams, and they ask simply that a sufficient amount of the money heretofore appropriated shall be applicable to this purpose.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I offer the following amendment to the bill as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to apply and use for the completion and protection of the wing-dams, jetties, and other improvements of the Chippewa River in the State of Wisconsin, located at and near the mouth of said river, so much of the moneys appropriated by an act of Congress approved March 4, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, as were appropriated "for the protection of the high sand-banks on the Chippewa River," &c., as may be required for such purpose herein provided: Provided, That such use or application of the moneys herein authorized shall be made under the same limitations and conditions as provided in the act hereinbefore named.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I deem myself fortunate at having been the occasion of the very eloquent speech to which I have listened from two Senators. I say "two Senators" because that speech is not the product of the honorable Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] alone. Very valuable and audible contributions were made by my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK;] and I rise partly to enjoy the privilege of expressing at once my admiration and my envy of that honorable Senator—I mean the Senator from Kentucky. Admiring him for his ability and his courage as I do, I envy the impunity which attends him.

Some time ago, very innocently as it seemed to me, I read briefly from a page of the finance report so called and briefly from a page of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue so called, and I found myself the subject of no end of chiding for having done so. I was charged with many unpalatable assumptions because in the hearing of the Senate I read a few figures from those documents. Now to illustrate—for that is the point I am upon—the impunity of the Senator from Kentucky, a few days afterward he came in here with a whole shovelful of dying embers, with an immense quantity of smoldering fires; he dumped them here, made them blaze in the presence of the Senate. Nobody took any exception. He put in the RECORD bodily not merely what I had read but the whole of the page from which I had read; and here is this sectional, invidious, prejudicial, reprehensible, and outrageous matter spread before the Senate and the country, for reading a little part of which I was so severely reprimanded.

Mr. BECK. What does the Senator speak of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Kentucky does not wish me to yield if he will wait a moment; I am in the very act of pronouncing a eulogy upon him; I am in the very act of seeking to do him a small part of that justice to which I think he is entitled; and therefore I had mentioned that the Senator from Kentucky brought in here all these tables showing how much internal revenue and again how much of customs duties were paid by every State, by the State which he represents with so much distinction, by all the other States, and he has printed them at large in the RECORD—the whole of them—thus I repeat fanning the dying embers, stirring the smoldering fires, and raising again the sectional hates and discords which I have been so reprimanded for approaching, my offense being that I read a small part of that the whole of which the honorable Senator from Kentucky brought here and had printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, that has nothing to do with the bill before the Senate; it has only to do with the honorable Senator from Kentucky and with his power safely to do, to do with impunity, that which might cost me a great deal, which might give great offense and entail upon me very disagreeable consequences. So the honorable Senator from Kentucky in his seat, without rising, furnishes to the Senator from West Virginia suggestions in aid of the pending bill; and yet the pending bill, if I mistake not, contains that which, were I to advocate it, were it to be advocated at some other time by some Senator on the side of the Chamber on which I do not at this moment stand but where I usually am, would be regarded as centralization, as a monstrous argument in favor of the usurpation of power by the Federal Government dangerous in its nature and detrimental in its proposed exercise. I have no doubt, however, the honorable Senator from Kentucky can vindicate it safely, the Senator from West Virginia can vindicate it safely; and when they have done so, it will only prove that although the law is said to be no respecter of persons, opportunities and advantages and distinctions among men make all sorts of choice between persons.

Now, Mr. President, what is the question fairly presented by this bill? The Senator from West Virginia seems to think it is whether a stream must be a tidal stream in order to be navigable. Nobody has suggested that in this debate. I do not think I ever heard it suggested in the Senate. A tidal stream! Certainly not. When a bill was filed to prostrate the Wheeling bridge, with all the contention which that case underwent, nobody ever argued that the criterion of a stream in respect of its being navigable or being national was whether the tide ebbed and flowed. On the contrary it was said there, this is a boundary stream, it bounds four or five States, it drains eleven States, it is a national stream. Everybody knew then as now that the tide rises as high perhaps as Baton Rouge, one hundred and fifty miles or so above the mouth of the Mississippi, but never beyond that.

So the Senator from West Virginia is quite beside the purpose in reading an opinion to show that the question whether the tide ebbs and flows in a stream has or has not anything to do with that being a navigable stream. The Senator reads further to show that a stream is deemed navigable in a general sense, although it may be wholly within a State, if it connects itself with other streams or other channels, and thus crosses State lines. No doubt of it. No authority is necessary to establish that. The statute-books are full of the assertion of that truth.

Now, what is the question to which the honorable Senator should have read, and to which he has read no authority whatever? It is whether under the power referred to by Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, the power in respect of the common defense and the general welfare, Congress may go into a State and create an improvement local in its nature or a channel local in its nature, and then as an incident to that power proceed to condemn the property of the owners as private property taken for public use; and I might suggest that a further question which the Senator himself brought in would be whether the States, to use his language, could give power to the General Government to do it. I respectfully ask the attention of any lawyer who is regarding this question to that proposition of the honorable Senator from West Virginia. He repeated twice, if I understood him aright, that the State of West Virginia had given the power to the National Government to go into the State of West Virginia and do this thing. It is new to me that the State of West Virginia or any other State can enlarge the powers conferred by the Constitution, or add to the enumeration of powers there found.

Mr. HEREFORD. I did not say that the State of West Virginia gave to the General Government the power to go into the State of West Virginia and improve this river. I said that she had given her consent to the General Government acquiring title to property for the purpose of improving this river.

Mr. CONKLING. The exact words of the honorable Senator are not important, and certainly I am glad to have him make any modification which he chooses now; but I repeat that the Senator's statement was that the State of West Virginia had given the power to the National Government to go into that State and condemn the necessary land, and I will appeal to the Reporter's notes, and if that statement does not there appear twice I will make it a point publicly to apologize to the honorable Senator. But no matter; he says now he meant that the State had given its consent. That statement he can vindicate no doubt by history. The State of West Virginia has given her consent that the National Government may proceed. I think I need not argue that that does not in one iota add to the power conferred by the Constitution in this regard. It may remove one impediment in the exertion of that power which the State of West Virginia would have had more or less opportunity to insist upon, but it leaves the power exactly where the Constitution leaves it.

The Senator says that I spoke of national highways of commerce. I speak of them again; and in the presence of all these decisions I affirm, and the Senator will have to find an express decision before he reads authority to contradict me, that the power to make internal improvements does relate to and is confined to objects national and general in their nature and circumstance. The Senator said there were many streams in the State from which I come which have been improved by Congress. I invited him to name one, but he admitted his inabilty to do so.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Does not the Hudson belong to New York?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, my honorable friend, the senior Senator from West Virginia will not rival the fame of Malte Brun by having put that question. Does he think the Hudson River is a river such as his colleague described, a stream wholly within the State of New York, a small stream wholly within the State of New York? And now the Senator wants to be heard again in saying "yes." Well, I suggest to him not to confine his observation of the map to West Virginia hereafter, but to look at the State of New York and look at the State of New Jersey and see that the Hudson River is a stream running between New Jersey and New York, an arm of the sea, a stream emptying into the ocean and resulting in a harbor in which the ships of all nationalities ride and anchor, and then see whether he thinks that is such a stream as his colleague was talking about as a small stream wholly in the State of New York and in that sense local in its character.

Mr. DAVIS of West Virginia. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly, I always yield to my friend from West Virginia.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator tell us whether or not the Hudson takes its source in New York State, and whether or not it gets out of the State anywhere—if it is not wholly within the State? It is true that near New York City, far below Albany, it divides the two States of New York and New Jersey; but I am of the opinion—I am not positive, but I believe—it takes its source in the State of New York.

Mr. CONKLING. When the honorable Senator asks me to state exactly where the Hudson River takes its rise, he proposes rather a difficult conundrum. However, as the river Saint Lawrence sweeps the northern boundary of New York, no doubt all of the many streams and springs which finally result in the Hudson River take their rise south of the Saint Lawrence; and therefore if the Senator wishes an admission that the headwaters of the Hudson are in the State of New York, that admission is as free as it is true. But when he suggests by his question if I got his words that it does not get out of the State of New York, I can only say that I wonder at the Senator for making such an observation. It runs down along the counties of Columbia, Duchess, and Westchester on one side and the corresponding counties on the other, until it reaches the State of New Jersey, and there it runs between the two States until it reaches the harbor into which it pours, that harbor being the greatest of all the national harbors in the use to which it is applied. And yet the Senator has introduced the Hudson River to justify a remark made by his colleague which was that there were many instances of small streams in the State of New York which had been improved out of the National Treasury!

Mr. President, I will put my knowledge of history at peril so far to confess that I know of no one such instance. The Mohawk River, a very considerable stream, in the time of our fathers was navigated. George Washington passed up the Mohawk River, a large part of it, in a flatboat, according to history and tradition. Troops and munitions of war passed in the same way. There were dams, there was slack-water navigation; but it never occurred to the men of that generation, nor has it occurred to the men of this generation, that it was suitable or admissible for the State of New York to ask the National Government to make appropriations to improve a stream like the Mohawk River, although that stream was of consequence enough to be celebrated in song by the poet Tom Moore, whose centennial has just been celebrated. I presume other poets have sung of the Great Kanawha and the Little Kanawha, and I would not for the world take from those rivers a laurel or a bubble which belongs to them. I say, however, with great respect to those illustrious rivers and to all others, that the boundary, in my belief, is not difficult of statement between national power and some other power in this regard. The Senator from West Virginia seems to think that the test is whether the stream connects, or can be made to connect, with something else which passes beyond a State line. Is there any possible channel of commerce you can name of which that may not be true? The Erie Canal is an artificial river three hundred and thirty miles long. It runs from Lake Erie to the Hudson River, and by way of the Hudson River to the harbor of New York, to the mouth of the markets of the world; but it never occurred to the men of New York that we could come here and ask all the States to pay tribute and to purchase sites for the locks to be found on the Erie Canal, or for the expenditure which constructed that highway of commerce; yet it is very important. The river Rhine traverses seven sovereignties in the heart of Europe and it is navigable, and the principalities and provinces which it traverses are densely populated; and yet the Erie Canal floats many times as much traffic as is carried on that European stream, and according to the argument of the honorable Senator, it has every element essential to its recognition by Congress. It certainly can be navigated; it is navigated. It certainly connects across State lines with other great channels of commerce. Then it is within the doctrine as the Senator understands it.

Now I will try to tell the Senator why I think it is not within the fair intendment of these provisions of the Constitution. For a considerable part of the distance traversed by the Erie Canal, small natural streams were found, which were utilized. Much of the way the channel is an original one; but that does not change the law of the case at all. I think no Senator on consideration will argue that if you find a brook running one hundred miles in the State of Kentucky, which everybody knows is not navigable, upon parts of which a boy might row a skiff or paddle a canoe but which is of such shallowness as to be in no sense navigable, and if by dredging it, by digging it out, by making a depth of channel and then gathering water from the flowage and soakage of the higher lands into it until you have volume enough to carry on commerce upon it in some sense,—no Senator who is a lawyer will argue that that will be a different case from the same volume of water and the same channel made if the brook had not been there originally. Nor will any lawyer argue that when in either case the improvement has been made, that establishes the fact that it was in the beginning one of the streams spoken of by Judge Story, not local in its nature but relating to the national welfare and the national commerce.

But take another case; take the case of the Mississippi River running from Minnesota to Louisiana and through Louisiana. You find a shoal upon the river; you blast it out; you dig it out, or you do another thing, proposed originally by a very wise man who lived and died in the State of New York, who, when he came to lay out a road, in place of going over a hill went around it, and remarked that the rim of a pot was no longer when you laid it down than when you stood it up; therefore he laid out his road to go around the hill. So in improving the Mississippi River, in place of excavating at enormous cost the identical channel for seven or eight or nine miles, no matter what the distance, you make a channel, you cut around this ledge of rock, these rapids, these obstructions. We see very plainly how all that falls within the purview of these provisions as I understand them. We also see, I think, that they make no advance at all in the argument that under the national authority you may go and divert the course of, or dig out, or turn into something new, a local and shallow stream.

Now let us see what Judge Story says:

> Another question, which has for a long time agitated the public councils of the nation, is, as to the authority of Congress to make roads, canals, and other internal improvements.
> So far as regards the right to appropriate money to internal improvements generally, the subject has already passed under review in considering the power to lay and collect taxes. The doctrine there contended for, which has been in a great measure borne out by the actual practice of the Government, is, that Congress may appropriate money, not only to clear obstructions to navigable rivers, to improve harbors, to build breakwaters, to assist navigation, to erect forts, light-houses, and piers, and for other purposes allied to some of the enumerated powers, but may also appropriate it in aid of canals, roads, and other institutions of a similar nature existing under State authority.

Certainly he made that remark in view of the legislation and the controversy about the Maysville road. Nobody doubts that, under the authority to establish post-offices and post-roads, the General Government might, as the General Government did, maintain a road overland to the Pacific sea, all the way across the continent. But will it be argued from that, and as proved by that, that the General Government may improve the streets of all the cities and all the counties and the roads of all the States? I think not. So the authority which the Senator reads from, Judge Story, as I understand it, is in the direction, not of the argument,—for I am making none; I rose for no such purpose,—of the suggestions which now and sometimes heretofore I have submitted to the Senate. No doubt you may find a case which comes very near the line on one side or the other, and lawyers will differ in respect of which side of the line the particular instance falls; but the general doctrine is clear enough that the States under their reserved police powers, as I may call them, generically speaking—Marshall so called them—may charter ferries, construct bridges, build roads, take care of their streams in all respects. When you come to streams, or to roads, or to any other subject of jurisdiction national in character, then Congress may take charge. If the State of Pennsylvania wants a water-lift to get over the Alleghany Mountains, it surely would occur to the State of Pennsylvania to build that water-lift herself and maintain it. It did so occur to her. If the State of New York needs, as she thought she did, twelve hundred and fifty miles of artificial rivers, it occurs to her that she is bound to build those rivers. She did build them, and she did pay for them, not one penny of national appropriation ever having been made. So everywhere else. But when you come to blasting out rocks in Hell Gate in the East River, in New York, to removing snags from the Mississippi River, to deepening the pass at the mouth of the Mississippi from New Orleans to the Gulf, to dredging the Ohio River, and to a great variety of other similar instances, nobody can doubt that there the Constitution of the United States lays hold; it covers the case.

Mr. President, I say again I did not rise to make any assault upon any interest of West Virginia or anything dear to the heart of either or both the Senators from that State, but merely to call attention to the increase of this species of legislation. First in a bill is put a little proviso authorizing a survey to be made of a long list of streams; then comes the report of the engineers who make the survey, and unless you require them to invent a mode by which vessels may sail in the air or on the tops of mountains, they will show you that within engineering possibilities money, if you have enough of it, can produce a channel in the given place on which water-craft can move, and to which water will go or can be brought. That done, it becomes a matter of zeal and competition by every Senator and Representative to get into the river and harbor bill as many and as much as is possible concerning his section, as it is sometimes called; and when one appropriation has been made, the work cannot be left unfinished, and you must go on to the end. Thus it is that having put our finger between the belt and the wheel we are pulled in bodily to one after another of these manifold schemes. For one, I protest against it. I am ready to vote for any work feasible, economical, and national in the sense in which I have been speaking, so far national that it contributes to the commerce of the country, that it concerns the commerce of the country, as the works do in the instances used for illustration by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I do not differ with him at all about those. There I am willing to vote money; but there should be some stopping place, and I submit that that place is indicated with some approach to certainty by the more ancient legislative precedents, and by what seems to me the tolerably plain intendments of the Constitution.

I assure the Senator from West Virginia again that I had no purpose to select his particular pet measure, or his State, in regard to which he is always so zealous, as the text or occasion of preaching any crusade or even sermon against internal improvements. Far from it. I was only reminded of it by the presentation of this bill, just as the Senator from Kentucky, by the little part he took, reminded me of how fortunate he is in being able, as in the instance to which I alluded, to do an entirely proper thing without having any improper motive attributed to him, whereas if some one of his brother Senators should do the same thing, or a small part of it, there would be no end of people to think that very great wrong had been done. So I take my leave of this subject and make my apology to both these Senators for having delayed for even a moment the realization of their wishes in respect of this bill.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I assure the Senate that I had no idea of taking any part in this debate. I am not a member of the Committee on Commerce, nor had I looked into the question at all. But when there were so many contradictions of the statements made by the Senator from West Virginia, by a gentleman who had been so long chairman of the Committee on Commerce, I said to him what I thought might be known to him, that the United States had in a great many instances gone very far in making appropriations for the improvement of rivers. I cited to him the Louisville and Portland Canal, on which everybody knows we spent over $2,000,000. I cited to him the canal run across from the Fox to the Wisconsin River, which cost us $10,000,000, merely making an artificial highway between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River. I cited to him the fact that we had built a canal seven miles long, known as the Des Moines Rapids Canal, on the Upper Mississippi. That is "the head and front of my offending."

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Kentucky let me interrupt him but a moment?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I meant to have alluded to the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers improvement because it would have been the best illustration I could possibly have taken at one point of what I was seeking to establish. There are two rivers there, insignificant each in itself; but when they are enlarged sufficiently, if that can be, their enlargement constitutes a northern mouth of the Mississippi River. That is what it is, a northern mouth of the Mississippi River, so that vessels and cargoes without unlading or relading can pass from the Mississippi River into not one lake alone but into Lake Michigan at Green Bay, and so into the whole chain of lakes, coming down into the Erie Canal, or go through the Welland Canal, reaching the markets of the world. I am willing to say for one that I believe the success of the work of establishing that channel where the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers run, would be not only a work of national value, national in its character, but I believe no single act in respect to the commerce of this nation for the last decade has been of more consequence than that act would be. There you have a particular illustration, two streams being wholly within a State, of no particular consequence themselves; and the case is no better in my estimation than if there was not one single drop of water there. If a canal could be made, as it is proposed to make a canal across the Isthmus entirely on dry land, by which we could connect the Mississippi River and the great lakes, making a northern mouth to that river, there we have every element necessary to constitute a case in which the General Government could act.

I thank the Senator for allowing me to say a word about that work, and beg his pardon for having interrupted him.

Mr. BECK. I called the attention of my friend from West Virginia to various cases in which I thought the United States had strained their authority, at least beyond what was navigable at the time, because they cut a canal across the country from the Fox and Wisconsin, where there was no river and no sign of a river. It seemed to me there was a fair case for the Senator from West Virginia, and I suggested it to him. That is the way I was dragged into the debate. I might have suggested to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Commerce a case now before the Supreme Court. Not long ago the State of Minnesota sought to establish a harbor at a point called Duluth, situated on a tongue of land seven miles long, where the Saint Louis River divides Wisconsin from Minnesota. There was no entrance into the bay from Duluth, yet the city of Duluth cut it open in the night clandestinely. Injunctions were served upon them, and suits were pending in the Supreme Court until last year involving the right to turn the mouth of a navigable river for their own convenience, seven miles away from where it was. Yet the Committee on Commerce made appropriations for the harbor of Duluth, built some piers there to aid them, these distinguished gentlemen all being members of that committee. The Supreme Court of the United States declared that the very moment an appropriation was made by Congress, whether the work was legally or illegally begun, whether an artificial harbor had been created or a new mouth made, Congress having supreme authority over it, the courts have no power. An appropriation was recommended by this very Committee on Commerce when the distinguished Senator from New York was chairman to make a new harbor, cut a new mouth, to the Saint Louis River; and the Supreme Court decided that that act of Congress absolutely made it a national work.

The appropriations have all been made for the Kanawha and Kentucky Rivers, and by that act of appropriation they are by the Supreme Court made national works, natural rivers as they are and important ones, not artificial ones that have been created on the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce by putting bills through the House under a suspension of the rules when no man was allowed to open his mouth or even contradict what was said, as has been done time and again in the House, and with very little debate in the Senate.

I have never voted for river and harbor bills; I have resisted all these aggressions as much as anybody; but I gave those illustrations to the Senator from West Virginia for his benefit, for what they were worth, and not to the Senate. That is all I care about saying about this matter; I do not care to go into it at all.

The little speech I made the other day had to be alluded to as though I had done something fearful there. I do not think I ever read it after I made it. I sent for the RECORD and examined it here to-day. I did not quote a word from the Senator from New York. In that little speech made just at the close of the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, after all the amendments of the committee had been disposed of, I was telling the Senate just what the Committee on Appropriations had done and the reasons why they had done it. I was endeavoring to convince that committee that if they were going to practice economy it did not lie in the fact of cutting down a salary here or a salary there, or of starving a workman; but that it lay in the great fact of taking hold of the internal revenue and cutting off by the hundred the storekeepers and gangers, and by the consolidation of offices; by taking hold of the custom-houses. I showed where there were dozens of custom-houses that did not pay their own expenses, where hundreds of supernumeraries were kept. When I brought up a table to show that fact I did not ring it in nor bring in dying embers, or bring any trouble before the Senate. I said it was a very important paper and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] spoke up and said, "Let us have it all in the RECORD."

I said that it was an important paper, one I had obtained at the Treasury Department. When I quoted the Senator from New York I quoted what he said and tried to show that the impression he sought to make was all wrong, (perhaps I said absurd,) that eleven Southern States only paid $13,000,000, while the adhering States paid one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and thirty million dollars. I said the idea that the city of New York paid all the customs collected at that port could not be entertained, and that, as the Senator from New York had answered his own speech so well on that occasion, I expressed myself satisfied and did not seek to answer him any further.

Mr. CONKLING. What day's RECORD is that?

Mr. BECK. It is the 16th day of May, pages 24 and 25. I was seeking to show that except when business was embarrassed by heavy taxation the consumers paid the taxes, and that men paid them all over the South and all over the West as well as at the port of entry where the customs were paid. In regard to the suggestion made in the opening statement of the speech of the Senator from New York that the place where the money was paid into the Treasury enabled the proper parties to receive credit for it, I showed that my State was paying not only more than the six New England States but double as much as all the six New England States. I was glad to see the Senator from New York rise as he did upon that occasion, and explain that the consumption was the true test and not the point of location where the money was collected. That is the substance of the speech as I find by looking it over to-day. If I dragged in politics, or made a mistake, I am unable, looking at the RECORD this morning, to see it. I was seeking to contend, as I always contend, that there will be no reform in the expenditures of this Government until there is a thorough reduction of expenses in the collection of customs, in the collection of internal revenue, and in the fleets that are sailing about along the sea-coast. I said that the Committees on Appropriations of both Houses would do well to turn their attention to those things, matters of great importance, instead of following the old routine and looking at the small things on which to work economy. I was seeking to secure a system of definite appropriations so as to have everything come under the supervision of Congress, in order that there might be an honest examination and responsibility somewhere. It never entered my mind that I was saying anything offensive to any Senator. I find that when the Senator from New York was through with an explanation of what I submitted, I replied to him thus:

> Mr. President, I said I was trying to avoid politics in the management of this bill, and I am determined to continue to do it. But the Senator from New York has answered his own argument made the other day to my satisfaction when he has said that the consumers paid the tax.

Therefore I wanted to avoid any further dispute. As to this particular bill, as the appropriations have been made, as the Congress of the United States have by making appropriations assumed jurisdiction over these rivers, as we have had appropriations for a long time for the Kanawha, and under the decision of the Supreme Court it having become a national work, it becomes matter of detail for Congress to determine what is the best way to carry it on.

That is all I care to say. I have nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. CONKLING. Having listened to the Senator from Kentucky I feel very much discouraged. I rose with a well-intended, I thought well-directed, effort to compliment him, to express some part of the admiration which I feel for him; and now the Senator has been commenting upon me as if I had failed entirely in my design and had been doing something else. Among other things, he denies stoutly that he quoted the Senator from New York. I did not say he did. Then with some vehemence he states a great variety of things that he says he did. I agree with him, he said all those things; he said them well; he did all those things; he did them well. Now let me tell him what I did allege, and although I was and intended to be jocose at the time, I will be now as serious as the Senator in stating this fact.

Some time ago, in addressing the Senate I took up the Finance Report and the Internal Revenue Report, and I read without note or comment, without one word of observation of my own, a table found in those books. First, the democratic press of the country raised an uproar about the unfairness of what I had done. Well, I had done nothing except to read these reports, but it was unfair and it was untrue; I had charged that so many States paid so much of the revenue, or rather that so much of the revenue was gathered in certain States and that the residue was gathered in other States. The enormity of having made that statement was very generally commented on. Then five or six Senators in succession took the trouble in elaborately prepared addresses to reprimand me, to point out the wrong which I had done in this statement; and, after all that, what did the Senator from Kentucky do? Let me read from the RECORD. The Senator from Kentucky said:

> This list was made up for me by the gentleman in charge of the customs at the last session of Congress; and there is so much in it that the Senate ought to see that, if there is no objection, I will hand it to the Reporter and ask him to put it in the RECORD. I think it is a valuable paper.
> Mr. ALLISON. Let us have it all in.
> Mr. BECK. I thought Senators would want to see it.
> The list is as follows.

Then follows a list of the revenue gathered in all the States, State by State, the customs duties, the internal revenue, exactly what I had read, I making, I repeat, no comment upon it whatever, not a word; and nobody thought, at least nobody said, that the honorable Senator from Kentucky had done anything unfair. I think no sane person could allege sincerely that he had done anything which he ought not to do. He made use of an official statement instructive in its character and he put it in the RECORD. Therefore I ventured this morning to banter the honorable Senator from Kentucky a little, and to congratulate him upon the impunity and the safety with which he could do a thing, meeting no challenge whatever, provoking no criticism, eliciting no comment whatever—the very thing which when I had done it drew upon me no end of railing accusation.

I thought that an imposing and rather touching tribute to the distinction and the character of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I thought it showed the profound confidence which not only his brother Senators but the public and the rest of mankind feel in him; not a newspaper rebuked him, not a Senator found fault with him; and I could not help saying to myself, "Oh, that I had the authority, the persuasive force of the honorable Senator from Kentucky; then I might even go so far as to read an official statement without being called bad names for doing it." And when I have brought to the attention of the Senate this conspicuous proof of the eminence of the Senator from Kentucky, the respect not only but the endeared regard in which he is held and which protects him from unfriendly comment, he rises here in a resentful way and makes an argument or a statement as if really I had been doing something to him which ought not to be done in the interest of his constituents and of their illustrious representative upon this floor.

Although I shall not present any account to him and shall not insist that in strictness of speech he is bound to be grateful to me, and shall not argue that I have entitled myself to the lasting regard of the people of Kentucky by what I have done for their Senator, yet I do humbly submit to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that when I rise here to pay just and truthful tribute to him he shall not reward me with a stone and come back upon me ungraciously, even though I am not able to do as eloquently and as effectually as the honorable Senator would do, that is, seek to pay such a tribute to the representative of any other State as it was my humble purpose to pay to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to say that so far as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to this bill is concerned, I have no objection to the measure itself, except that if adopted as an amendment to the bill it necessarily sends the bill back to the House of Representatives, and between the two Houses it may fail. The Department need the authority provided for in this bill to go on with the work at once. I will say now to the Senate that it would afford me a great deal of pleasure as a substantive proposition to assist in the passage of the amendment at this session. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin in view of the fact, as I know he does not desire to cripple the bill or to embarrass it in any way, will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I shall vote for the bill advocated by the Senator from West Virginia with a great deal of pleasure. I do not wish to embarrass it in any way. I think a bill embodying the substance of the amendment which I have offered can be passed before the adjournment of the present session of Congress; and not desiring to embarrass the passage of the bill at all, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the democratic party seem to be undergoing so many changes of late that I hardly know where to find them. The present bill is an appendix to the act passed at the close of last session, appropriating $7,411,500. That act contained, I believe, more appropriations for what might be called unjustifiable objects than any other appropriation act of the sort that we have ever passed.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate not to any discussion that I propose, but to the position of the democratic party, not when the Maysville road bill was vetoed by General Jackson, but at a later date, to the message of President Polk. I ask the Secretary to read from his veto message of a river and harbor bill in 1847 that will be found on pages 134, 135, and 136 of the Sixteenth volume of Benton's Abridgment of the Debates of Congress some brief passages to which I desire to call the attention of my democratic friends in relation to these general appropriations for rivers and harbors.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> At the preceding session of Congress it became my duty to return with my objections to the House in which it originated a bill making similar appropriations and involving like principles; and the views then expressed remain unchanged.
> The experience of several of the States, as well as that of the United States, during the period that Congress exercised the power of appropriating the public money for internal improvements is full of eloquent warnings. It seems impossible, in the nature of the subject as connected with local representation, that the several objects presented for improvement shall be weighed according to their respective merits, and appropriations confined to those whose importance would justify a tax on the whole community to effect their accomplishment.
> Regarding only objects of improvement of the nature of those embraced in this bill, how inexhaustible we shall find them. Let the imagination run along our coast, from the river Saint Croix to the Rio Grande, and trace every river emptying into the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico to its source; let it coast along our lakes, and ascend all their tributaries; let it pass to Oregon, and explore all its bays, inlets, and streams; and then let it raise the curtain of the future, and contemplate the extent of this Republic, and the objects of improvement it will embrace, as it advances to its high destiny, and the mind will be startled at the immensity and danger of the power which the principle of this bill involves.
> What is denominated a harbor by this system does not necessarily mean a bay, inlet, or arm of the sea on the ocean or on our lake shores, on the margin of which may exist a commercial city or town engaged in foreign or domestic trade; but is made to embrace waters where there is not only no such city or town, but no commerce of any kind. By it a bay or sheet of shoal water is called a harbor, and appropriations demanded from Congress to deepen it, with a view to draw commerce to it, or to enable individuals to build up a town or city on its margin, upon speculation, and for their own private advantage.
> What is denominated a river, which may be improved, in the system, is equally undefined in its meaning. It may be the Mississippi, or it may be the smallest and most obscure and unimportant stream bearing the name of river which is to be found in any State in the Union.
> Giving to the subject the most serious and candid consideration of which my mind is capable, I cannot perceive any intermediate grounds. The power to improve harbors and rivers for purposes of navigation, by deepening or cleaning out, by dams and sluices, by locking or canaling, must be admitted without any other limitation than the discretion of Congress, or it must be denied altogether. If it be admitted, how broad and how susceptible of enormous abuses is the power thus vested in the General Government! There is not an inlet of the ocean or the lakes, not a river, creek, or streamlet within the States, which is not brought for this purpose within the power and jurisdiction of the General Government.

Mr. MORRILL. That is all, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CONKLING. For the reason particularly among others that this bill includes the power to condemn private property in order to construct these locks, I ask for the yeas and nays upon its passage. I should like to have the sense of the Senate upon the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] Although I do not know how he would vote on this question, I prefer to withdraw my vote.

Mr. FARLEY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I am unable to say how he would vote on this question.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator certainly does not call this a political question.

Mr. FARLEY. I know it is not, but under the circumstances I do not know whether I would be justified in voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator must see, of course, that there is no politics in the bill. If he is paired on political questions, certainly the pair would not extend to this vote; for I see that Senators on either side have voted for and against the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the Senator hear the Senator from Rhode Island withdraw his vote because he was paired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California withdraw his vote?

Mr. FARLEY. No, sir; I have not yet done so. The reason why I made the suggestion was because I understand the Senator from Nevada is a member of the Committee on Commerce. I do not know what his action was in the committee.

Mr. HEREFORD. I will state that the Senator from Nevada was not present at the time the committee acted upon the bill.

Mr. FARLEY. I will, then, let my vote stand.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from California withdrew his vote?

Mr. FARLEY. I did not, for the reason that I understand the Senator from Nevada has not taken any part in this matter either as a member of the committee or as a member of the Senate. It not being a political question, I apprehend that my pair does not extend to it.

Mr. CONKLING. I took the liberty of making the inquiry, not with the view of interfering with this pair, but because there is one pair at least somewhat in my charge, and because the Senator from Rhode Island on my right [Mr. ANTHONY] withdrew his vote, he being paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] he declaring that he does not know at all how that Senator would vote on this question. He is paired on political questions and he withdrew his vote.

Mr. FARLEY. Under the circumstances, my own judgment is that I ought not to vote. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. RANSOM, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I desire to say that I am paired this week with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] Not thinking that this was a political question and knowing that his colleague [Mr. DAWES] had charge of the pair in connection with myself, I consulted with him and we determined that it was not political and I voted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired on all questions upon which they would differ, with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] I do not know how either Senator would vote in this case.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Coke,	Jonas,	Voorhees,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Florida,	Walker,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have the title of the bill read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the title.

The Chief Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879.

Mr. ANTHONY. How could an act be approved on March 4 when Congress was not in session on March 4?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island propose to amend the title?

Mr. ANTHONY. I raise the question. I do not propose to amend it because I do not know but that the enrolled act bears that date; but if it does it is incorrect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it does, it is not a good law; that is all.

Mr. ANTHONY. Congress was not in session on the 4th of March and the bill could not have been signed on that day.

Mr. HEREFORD. The print says that the act was approved March 4.

Mr. ANTHONY. The enrolled act?

Mr. HEREFORD. The printed law says that it was approved March 4. I hold the law in my hand.

Mr. ANTHONY. It could not have been legally approved on that day.

Mr. HEREFORD. "Approved March 4, 1879," says the printed official copy.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it was approved on the 4th of March it is not a law, I take it. I leave it to the lawyers to settle that question, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the title stand as reported? No amendment being proposed, the title will stand as reported.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MAXEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes. I will state to the Senate that the bill contains nothing whatever except what it purports to contain, the establishment of post-routes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was the bill reported?

Mr. MAXEY. It was reported from the Senate Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads on the 29th of May, with amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not know that it had been reported.

Mr. MAXEY. It was reported and printed with the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Texas, as there is nothing pressing, now that the bill is up, will allow the matter to go over until to-morrow and permit me to move an adjournment. I should like to look at it in the mean time, and this may save the trouble of reading it.

Mr. MAXEY. I have no objection to the suggestion whatever. As I understand that there are some Senators who have not yet presented their amendments, I will state that I am anxious to get the bill disposed of, because the Senate committee have put in a great many amendments, and the bill will necessarily have to go back to the House. We lost one post-route bill a year or so ago by keeping it too long, and I want this bill to reach the House in time to secure its passage. I have no objection whatever to allowing it to go over as the unfinished business to be taken up in the morning.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Before the bill is disposed of for to-day, I ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I yield to anybody, only reserving the floor, if I may, with the right to move an adjournment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I desire to offer two amendments to the post-route bill. I send them to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What disposition does the Senator desire shall be made of the amendments?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Let them lie on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not the rule require them to be referred?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Then I ask that they be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

Mr. CALL. I offer an amendment to the post-route bill now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that all the amendments may be considered as lying on the table that have been referred to the committee, to be considered with the bill when it comes up for action.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I renew my motion to adjourn if no other Senator wishes to address the Chair.

Mr. BECK. I ask if it will be in order for me to give notice that to-morrow when the bill is up I shall offer an amendment to the post-route bill that I have not yet had printed, declaring all the present public highways in the United States post-routes, and authorizing the Postmaster-General to put service upon them when the public interests so require.

Mr. MAXEY. That amendment I am not authorized to accept; because that would be entirely new legislation, and would not be the establishment of post-routes in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be in order to move it probably for the consideration of the Senate. That is all; the Senator from Kentucky gives notice of it.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to have one day's notice of that.

Mr. BECK. I give notice that I shall move the amendment to-morrow. I will present it in writing in the mean time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that the rule requires that all amendments to a post-route bill shall go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. If it does, the Senator from Kentucky had better submit his amendment and have it go to the committee, and then it will be in order to-morrow.

Mr. BECK. I cannot lay my hand on it at this moment. I had it lying on my desk.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say there will be unanimous consent to treat it as if it were referred.

Mr. BECK. It is the amendment I offered at the last session. I will refer it to the committee. I will send it to the chairman in a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I presume there will be no objection to the suggestion I make, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky be treated as duly received and referred. We all know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there unanimous consent that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kentucky shall be so treated? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and forty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 2, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. DAVID WILLS, D. D.

The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER-ELECT.

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to a privileged question. Mr. Columbus Upson, member-elect from the sixth congressional district of the State of Texas, is present and desires to be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had placed in his hands the certificate of the governor of the State of Texas, which will not be read unless demanded.

Mr. CONGER. What does it relate to?

The SPEAKER. It relates to the election of a member to this House.

Mr. CONGER. That is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The practice has been not to read these certificates.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be published in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the certificate will be published in the RECORD.

The certificate is as follows:

THE STATE OF TEXAS, EXECUTIVE OFFICE.

I, O. M. Roberts, governor of Texas, do hereby certify that the returns of an election held on the 15th day of April, A. D. 1879, in the counties composing the sixth congressional district of the State of Texas, for Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States, show that Columbus Upson received the highest number of votes given for said office, and I hereby declare that Columbus Upson has been duly elected to said office of Representative in the United States Congress from the sixth congressional district of this State to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. Gustave Schleicher, Representative from said district.

In testimony whereof I hereto sign my name and cause the seal of State to be affixed at the city of Austin, this 26th day of May, A. D. 1879.

[SEAL.] O. M. ROBERTS, Governor.

By the governor.

JOHN D. TEMPLETON, Secretary of State.

Mr. UPSON appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

CORRECTION.

Mr. SPEER. I find it stated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 18th May that I presented certain papers relating to the claim of Joel A. Billups for compensation for property taken by United States authorities in May or June, 1865, which were referred to the Committee of Claims. I desire to state I presented no such papers, and was in the State of Georgia when the papers were presented, if they were presented.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at ten minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider. Under this call joint resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures are in order. Under this call, also, resolutions calling upon the Executive Departments for information will be in order for reference to appropriate committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the call be extended until all the States and Territories have been gone through.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will withdraw the objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I also hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. Unless this unanimous consent is given some States may not be reached.

Mr. CONGER. I do not withdraw the objection.

WORKINGMEN OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MURCH introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 76) to provide for the speedy payment of the workingmen of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MURCH. I move that the rules be suspended and that the joint resolution be put on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order at this time.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN F. V. STEWART.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2026) for the relief of Captain F. V. Stewart, late assistant quartermaster United States volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. STEVENSON (by request of Mr. LADD) also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 81) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the brig Katie; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JOSEPH H. CROW.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2127) granting a pension to Joseph H. Crow, late captain Company F, One hundred and fifty-second Regiment Illinois Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, also submitted a resolution providing for an amendment to the rules; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BARBER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2128) to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

VINZENZ BONER.

Mr. HAYES introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2129) for the relief of Vinzenz Boner, late of Company L, Fifteenth Illinois Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2130) for the relief of George Bancroft, of Company G, Tenth Illinois Cavalry Regiment; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SOLDIERS DURING ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2131) to regulate the stations of soldiers during elections; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. SPRINGER. I also gave notice of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule 51 be amended by adding thereto the following:

And any pending measure reported but not disposed of shall be regarded as unfinished business, and shall be in order after the morning hour of any day when such business would be in order.

Mr. CONGER. What is that?

The SPEAKER. It is a resolution providing for an amendment of the rules, for reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not want it referred; I only give notice of the proposed amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the introduction of that resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is in order for reference.

Mr. CONGER. Under what rule?

The SPEAKER. Under the practice of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I doubt whether there has been any practice of that kind of late years.

The SPEAKER. In the Forty-second Congress it was clearly decided by the then occupant of the chair, Speaker BLAINE, that an amendment to the rules was in order for reference during the morning hour of Monday. It would not be in order in the nature of a notice, but the Chair holds that it is in order under the practice for reference.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then, I offer it for reference.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that that is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the decision to which he has referred.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have that decision read. How can it be in order under a rule which specifies particularly bills and joint resolutions, and the new amendment to the rules permitting resolutions of inquiry to be introduced for reference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the decision to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MONDAY, February 1, 1875.

Mr. Cessna submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the following be adopted as additional standing rules of the House:

RULE 167. Whenever a question is pending before the House, the Speaker shall not entertain any motion of a dilatory character except one motion to adjourn and one motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn; which latter motion shall not be made more than once pending the consideration of the same bill or joint resolution. But at no time except during the last six days of the session shall the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of any bill or joint resolution be ordered during the first day of its consideration unless upon the vote taken to second the demand two-thirds shall have been found to have voted in favor thereof: Provided, That this rule shall not apply to House resolutions offered in the morning hour of Monday: And provided further, That this rule shall not apply to any proposition to appropriate the money, credit, or property of the United States, except bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations for the support of the Government or some branch or officer thereof.

RULE 168. It shall be in order for the Judiciary Committee to report bills and joint resolutions of a public character at any time during Tuesdays and Thursdays: Provided, however, That this privilege shall not be so exercised as to interfere with the morning hour, nor with the consideration of regular appropriation bills, nor of the bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means affecting the revenue, nor with special orders previously assigned.

RULE 169. It shall be in order for the House by a majority vote to dispense with the further reading and correction of the Journal at any time after thirty minutes shall have been spent in such reading and correction.

And moved that the same be referred to the Committee on the Rules.

The same having been read,

Mr. Eldridge made the point of order that the said resolution was not in order under the present call.

The Speaker decided that a resolution to amend the rules may be read and referred to the Committee on the Rules during the first call of States in the morning hour of Monday, and this constitutes notice according to the usages of the House.

From this decision of the Chair Mr. RANDALL appealed.

Pending which,

Mr. James Wilson moved that the appeal be laid on the table.

And the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 175, nays 84.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will give his attention. The Chair understood the gentleman to state that he did not ask for the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. I see that according to the ruling of the former Speaker it must be offered for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not allow the application as notice given, and states that the practice of the House allows the introduction of these proposed amendments to the rules during the morning hour of Monday for reference.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman did not ask for its reference and does not now, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair states that he has not a right now to introduce the resolution, except for reference; and that is based upon the decision of the former Speaker.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I offer it for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that no harm will probably result, because the Committee on Rules will have to report on the resolution. This is merely an enlargement of the subjects to be introduced during the morning hour of Monday for consideration by committees; that is the practical effect of it, which has since the time referred to grown into a practice in the House.

Mr. CONGER. Then the Chair does not entertain the proposition, as it is not offered for reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated to the gentleman from Illinois that he cannot receive the proposition except for reference, and the Chair understands the gentleman now to introduce it for reference. For this purpose the Chair entertains it.

Mr. CONGER. I make a point of order against the introduction of such a proposition at this time, as the present occupant of the chair did on a former occasion, as appears by what the Clerk has read. I am very happy to have so illustrious a precedent for my position that the introduction of such a proposition at this time is not in accordance with the rules, notwithstanding the decision of a former Speaker.

The SPEAKER. This decision has been placed in the Manual and has been adopted by the House. The Chair thinks the better way would have been to have allowed propositions for amendments to the rules to be introduced at any time when there was a gap in legislative business. But this is the rule which governs the House, as the question was decided by the House upon an appeal.

Mr. CONGER. I have such confidence in the judgment of the present occupant of the chair as expressed on the occasion referred to, that I insist upon my point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not at liberty to disregard a decision of a former Speaker where such decision has been affirmed by a vote of the House.

Mr. CONGER. But if it is a wrong decision it might be disaffirmed by the House now. I desire the Chair to rule on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that under the practice of the House and according to the decision of a former House, which until overturned is binding on this House, a proposition for amendment to the rules is in order when presented for reference during the morning hour of Monday.

Mr. CONGER. And from this decision of the Chair I appeal, as the present occupant of the chair did on a former occasion.

Mr. COX. I will move to lay the appeal on the table; but before doing so I wish to say that this rule was——

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate. If the gentleman makes the motion to lay on the table, debate is not in order.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my motion for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair having heard the gentleman from Michigan on the point of order thought it equitable to hear the other side.

Mr. CONGER. That was before a motion had been made to lay on the table, and debate was then in order.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my motion for a moment. If the gentleman from Michigan wants to do some talking I will yield to him.

Mr. CONGER. I am only objecting to the gentleman talking because this is an excessively warm day, and it might injure his health.

Mr. COX. That, I should suppose, would be a reason why the gentleman should subside himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, this ruling was made by Speaker BLAINE on a point raised by the present occupant of the chair. An appeal was taken; and the House by its vote sustained the then Speaker in his ruling. Under that ruling motions to amend the rules have always been allowed when brought in for reference during the morning hour of Monday. The propriety of receiving such propositions at that time is res adjudicata. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that under the decision referred to, the practice of introducing these propositions during the morning hour of Monday has grown up.

Mr. CONGER. Excepting the case to which my attention has been called by the extract read from the Journal, this is the first case in which I have known a proposition of this kind to be introduced during the morning hour of Monday, except by consent, under which, of course, anything can be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if he had time to look up the references, thinks he would be able to show the gentleman that the Forty-third, Forty-fourth, and the Forty-fifth Congresses permitted this practice.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair will readily see that upon questions of this kind discussion might arise so that the morning hour of Monday would be constantly wasted, and the spirit of the rule which allows no debate during the morning hour of Monday and which contemplates that nothing shall interfere with the presentation of bills, would be violated. It would be within the power of a few men to prevent the possibility of getting through with the call of States during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That is one of the incongruities of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. I will ask whether the morning hour has not expired?

Mr. FINLEY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I will take the coming week to look over the authorities upon this point.

INVESTIGATION OF DEPRESSION OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] has given notice to the Chair that he is instructed by the Select Committee on the causes of the present Depression of Labor to submit a resolution and move a suspension of the rules to adopt it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I would like to have the morning hour extended so that all the States could be called through this morning hour for the introduction of bills.

Mr. WRIGHT. By instruction of the Select Committee to inquire into the causes of the present Depression of Labor I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and move to suspend the rules so as to adopt it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the additional sum of $2,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the House for the use of the Select Committee to inquire into the causes of the present Depression of Labor, so as to carry out the order of the House heretofore made, April 23, 1879; and said sum shall be paid to the chairman of said committee, whose receipts shall be good and sufficient vouchers therefor.

Mr. WHITE. I object to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] if he objects to the resolution, has his remedy by voting against it.

Mr. WHITE. I believe I have the right to object to the resolution. I understand it is merely read for information.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is a unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; I object to this appropriation.

The SPEAKER. It is for the House, not the Chair, to consider the objection of the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it in order to move an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask a question for information?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask the chairman of the committee how much——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, and the gentleman will resume his seat.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. WRIGHT to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution, there were—ayes 110, noes 54.

Mr. WHITE. I demand the yeas and nays. [Cries of "No!"]

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the resolution was adopted, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] chairman of the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River, states to the Chair that he has been instructed by that committee to move to suspend the rules and pass a bill (H. R. No. 1847) to provide for the appointment of a "Mississippi River commission" for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes near its mouth to its headwaters, as proposed to be amended by that committee. The bill and amendments will be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That a commission is hereby created, to be called "The Mississippi River commission," to consist of five members.

SEC. 2. The President of the United States shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint five commissioners, three of whom shall be selected from the Engineer Corps of the Army, and two from civil life. And any vacancy which may occur in the commission shall in like manner be filled by the President of the United States; and he shall designate one of the commissioners appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army to be president of the commission. The commissioners appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army shall receive no other pay or compensation than is now allowed them by law, and the other two commissioners shall receive as pay and compensation for their services each the sum of $3,000 per annum; and the commissioners appointed under this act shall remain in office subject to removal by the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of said commission to direct and complete such surveys of said river between the head of the passes near its mouth to its headwaters as may now be in progress, and to make such additional surveys, examinations, and investigations, topographical, hydrographical, and hydrometrical, of said river and its tributaries, as may be deemed necessary by said commission to carry out the objects of this act. And to enable said commission to complete such surveys, examinations, and investigations, the Secretary of War shall, when requested by said commission, detail from the Engineer Corps of the Army such officers and men as may be necessary, and shall place in the charge and for the use of said commission such vessel or vessels and such machinery and instruments as may be under his control and may be deemed necessary; and the said commission may, with the approval of the Secretary of War, employ such additional force and assistants, and provide, by purchase or otherwise, such vessels or boats and such instruments and means as may be deemed necessary.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate, and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi River; improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof; prevent destructive floods; promote and facilitate commerce, trade, and the postal service; and when so prepared and matured, to submit to the Secretary of War a full and detailed report of their proceedings and actions, and of such plans, with estimates of the cost thereof, for the purposes aforesaid, to be by him transmitted to Congress: Provided, That the commission shall report in full upon the practicability, feasibility, and probable cost of the various plans known as the jetty system, the levee system, and the outlet system, as well as upon such others as they deem necessary.

SEC. 5. The said commission may, prior to the completion of all the surveys and examinations contemplated by this act, prepare and submit to the Secretary of War plans, specifications, and estimates of costs for such immediate works as, in the judgment of said commission, may constitute a part of the general system of works herein contemplated, to be by him transmitted to Congress.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of War may detail from the Engineer Corps of the Army of the United States any officer who may be selected and recommended by said commission to act as secretary of said commission.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $175,000 for the payment of the salaries herein provided for, and of the necessary expenses incurred in the completion of such surveys as may now be in progress, and of such additional surveys, examinations, and investigations as may be deemed necessary, and in maturing and perfecting and reporting the plans and estimates, and the plans, specifications, and estimates contemplated by this act, as herein provided for; and said sum is hereby appropriated for said purposes out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Section 6, line 2, strike out the word "any" and in lieu thereof insert "an;" and in line 3 strike out the following words: "Who may be selected and recommended by said commission."

Section 7, line 3, after the word "dollars," insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" and in line 7 strike out the words "and in maturing and perfecting and."

Mr. DUNNELL. I should like to hear the second section of the bill read again.

The second section was again read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think the bill should have been read as it is proposed to be amended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended by the committee of which he is chairman.

Mr. BAKER. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 29.

Mr. BAKER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were ayes 25.

The SPEAKER. Not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. BAKER. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-six have voted in favor of tellers, which is not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused, and the yeas and nays are refused. The vote is 104 in the affirmative and 29 in the negative. The ayes have it, two-thirds having voted in the affirmative.

Mr. BAKER. There is no quorum voting, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana raises the question of a quorum, and the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, and Mr. BAKER were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 129, noes 20.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

BALTIMORE POST OFFICE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] states to the Chair that he is instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to move to suspend the rules and pass a bill (H. R. No. 1478) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate for the purchase at private sale, or, if necessary, procure by condemnation, a site for a post-office in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to negotiate for the purchase, at private sale, or, if necessary, procure by condemnation, in pursuance of the statutes of the State of Maryland now in force, or any statute of said State which may hereafter be passed by its Legislature for that purpose, a suitable piece of ground or site in the city of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, for the erection of a building to be used for a post-office, the cost of the same not to exceed the sum of $500,000; and the sum of $4,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much as may be necessary therefor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the costs and expenses of condemnation of said ground or site, if proceedings of condemnation are, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, required to procure the same: Provided, That no money except the sum hereinbefore appropriated for expenses of condemnation be expended for purchase of said site until a valid title to such ground or site is vested in the United States, and the State of Maryland shall have released and relinquished jurisdiction over the same, and exempted from taxation such site and such buildings as may hereafter be erected thereon, so long as the same are the property of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Is it the opinion of the committee that the present post-office is insufficient?

Mr. KIMMEL. Yes, sir. The Postmaster-General says it is not sufficient.

Mr. BAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. It is because it was not in order that I made that inquiry.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 27.

Mr. WHITE. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KIMMEL and Mr. WHITE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 112, noes 17.

Mr. WHITE. I do not insist upon my point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order on the subject of a quorum has been withdrawn, and the tellers report—ayes 112, noes 17. So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the bill is passed.

BANKING AND CURRENCY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri states that the Committee on Banking and Currency have directed him to report a resolution, which will be read.

Mr. CONGER. Is this proceeding under the regulation of the Speaker in reference to motions to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is, and the Chair gives preference to gentlemen acting under instructions of committees of the House in preference to individual members, and in consequence the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] has been so far cut off from his right to be recognized as next on the list to submit a motion that the rules be suspended.

Mr. CONGER. I only wished to know under what rule the Chair was proceeding.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to say I have no instructions from the committee to move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair cannot recognize the gentleman.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have instructions to report the bill for passage, but not under a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is sufficient to warrant him in recognizing the gentleman from Missouri in preference to other gentlemen.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce certain bills for reference, not having been in the Hall when my State was called.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I object, unless the same privilege be extended to all of us.

Mr. WHITE. I was absent when my State was called. I ask the Chair to request unanimous consent for the introduction of bills by gentlemen who were absent when their States were called.

The SPEAKER. There were a number of States that were not called at all. The Chair, if such be the wish of gentlemen, will ask unanimous consent that those States which were not called during the morning hour may now be called and that those gentlemen who were not present when their States were called may be allowed the privilege of presenting bills for reference.

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. If I can make a conditional objection, I will say that I am quite willing bills should be introduced for reference, but if that would allow the introduction of resolutions of the character of that presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] I must object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman require me to give bonds to keep the peace?

Mr. CONGER. The Chair may request unanimous consent for the introduction of bills only.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I object.

Mr. MCLANE. I do not understand there is objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. THOMPSON.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] objects. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] is next on the list of gentlemen to be recognized for motions to suspend the rules.

TAX ON TOBACCO.

Mr. KENNA. I move that the rules be suspended and that the bill which I send to the desk be passed.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill to authorize producers to sell one hundred dollars' worth of tobacco on the farm where produced free of tax and without requiring a license therefor.

Mr. CONGER. From what committee does that come?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is next on the list which the Chair recognizes for his own guidance in this instance, the last recognition having been on the other side of the House.

Mr. CONGER. For a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. Is the gentleman from West Virginia next in order on the Speaker's list?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is the next in order on his side of the House on the individual list.

Mr. KENNA. My name I understand was first on the list, but other gentlemen have been recognized before me because they were instructed by their respective committees to move suspensions of the rules.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That producers are hereby authorized to sell one hundred dollars' worth of tobacco without paying any tax thereon or any license therefor.

The question being taken, the Speaker stated that, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds had not voted in the affirmative.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 114, nays 83, not voting 89; as follows:

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS AT SYDNEY AND MELBOURNE.

Mr. ATKINS obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to yield to me. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer and press a joint resolution in respect to exhibitions to be held this year, in August, in Sydney, New South Wales, and the coming year in Melbourne. Unless the law is passed now it will be of no avail.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York state that he is instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report the joint resolution?

Mr. COX. I am; and I would say that unless the House takes action now, it will be too late for any action to be taken upon the subject.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the gentleman to allow me time to say that these colonies spent from $25,000 to $50,000 to come to our exhibition at Philadelphia, and are desirous of extending their trade with us.

Mr. COX. I have a letter here from the Secretary of State, which I ask to have read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 17, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before your committee, for its consideration and action, the accompanying copy of a note, with its inclosure, received from Sir Edward Thornton, her Britannic majesty's diplomatic representative at this capital, conveying, by order of her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, the official invitation of the Government of Great Britain for this Government to take part in the Australian international exhibition to be held in Sydney, New South Wales, in August next. The extended scope of this exhibition will appear by an examination of the official programme thereof, a copy of which accompanied the note of the British minister, and is herewith inclosed.

A similar exhibition, but on even a larger scale, is announced to take place during the coming year at Melbourne, Victoria. The consul-general and vice-consul-general of the United States at that port have, in common with the other foreign consuls, been appointed members of the local general commission, and the most cordial hopes have been expressed that the United States may be suitably represented.

The mercantile communities throughout the United States have shown much interest in these two projected exhibitions, and inquiries are daily made of this Department as to the facilities to be given to intending exhibitors.

I have the honor, therefore, to suggest to your committee that such action be taken as will enable the acceptance of the invitation already received through the British Government, and the proper representation of the products and industries of the United States in the valuable markets of Australia. In view of the short interval which separates the two exhibitions, a single commission would suffice for both, and, upon the close of the one, could make due preparations for the opening of the other with the experience gained in the first. The appropriation of the sum of $20,000 would perhaps be sufficient; and, in consideration of the nearness of the time fixed for the inauguration of the exhibition at Sydney, I recommend that the appropriation made may be used for one or both of those exhibitions in the discretion of the Department of State.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WM. M. EVARTS.

Hon. SAMUEL S. COX,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Inclosures: Sir Edward Thornton to Mr. Evarts, May 12, 1879, with an accompaniment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 491) in relation to the accounts of the United States entomological commission; and

A bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned ordnance for the monument to Colonel Robert L. McCook, Ninth Ohio Volunteers, in Washington Park, in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio.

MONUMENT TO GENERAL M'COOK.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill from the Senate in relation to the monument to General McCook.

The SPEAKER. There is one matter now before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to withdraw that matter temporarily.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to taking up the bill to which the gentleman refers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] immediately after the pending question is disposed of.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS AT SYDNEY AND MELBOURNE.

Mr. COX. I move to suspend the rules and put the following joint resolution upon its passage. I send it to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution in relation to the international exhibitions to be held at Sydney and Melbourne, Australia, in 1879 and 1880.

Whereas the British Government have communicated to the Government of the United States an invitation on behalf of the colony of New South Wales to take part in a universal exhibition of products, manufactures, and arts, to be held in Sydney in the month of August next; and

Whereas the colony of Victoria has set on foot a similar exhibition, to be held at Melbourne during the coming year, and in the organization and conduct of which the commissioners and exhibitors of the United States are desired to participate:

Resolved by the Senate, &c., That to provide for the acceptance of said invitation and the representation of the United States in said exhibitions, there be and hereby is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to effect the purpose of this resolution, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of State for the purpose of effecting such representation at both or either of the said exhibitions.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures which may have been incurred under the provisions of this resolution, together with all reports which may be submitted by the person or persons delegated to carry out the purposes hereof as commissioners or otherwise, which reports shall be prepared and arranged with the view to concise statement and convenient reference.

The question was taken upon suspending the rules and passing the joint resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes 106, noes 26.

Mr. BOUCK. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BOUCK and Mr. COX were appointed.

The tellers having taken their places, before the count began,

Mr. BOUCK (one of the tellers) withdrew his point of order that no quorum had voted.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection on account of the want of a quorum?

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. There is; I object.

The SPEAKER. Then the tellers will retain their places and the count will proceed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 109, noes 40.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia, and Mr. KNOTT called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 30 in the affirmative; one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 62, not voting 86; as follows:

TUESDAY, June 3, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. MCPHERSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 70) authorizing Commodore J. W. A. Nicholson, United States Navy, to accept from his Catholic majesty the King of Spain the Grand Cross of Naval Merit, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MCPHERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 647) for the relief of William Grosch; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 648) to enforce the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and the Cherokee Nation of Indians proclaimed August 11, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER. I ask leave to introduce a bill. I do this by request, not knowing anything about the merits of the bill.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 649) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make contracts for the recovery of money, property, the proceeds of the sales of property, &c., belonging to the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Charles F. Tate be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. GARLAND, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers of Theresa Dardenne be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENT TO POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BECK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish condemned ordnance for the monument of Colonel Robert L. McCook, Ninth Ohio Volunteers, in Washington Park, in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1478) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate for the purchase at private sale, or, if necessary, procure by condemnation, a site for a post-office in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 1847) to provide for the appointment of a "Mississippi River commission" for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes near its mouth to its headwaters; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the international exhibitions to be held at Sydney and Melbourne, Australia, in 1879 and 1880.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 15,000 copies of the consular reports, with the letter of the Secretary of State transmitting the same, showing the rates of wages, hours of labor, prices of food, and general condition of the working classes in the several countries of Europe; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $10, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PUBLIC LANDS IN MINNESOTA AND DAKOTA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine business of the morning hour is at an end, and the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] on the 27th of May to refer to the select committee to inquire into alleged frauds in the late election so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene, of Rhode Island, as relates to the interference of Federal officers in the late election in that State.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I do not see the Senator from Indiana in his seat this morning, and I move that the consideration of this resolution be postponed for the purpose of moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1152. This is a bill of local importance which has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] who reported it from the committee asked to have it considered, and it was objected to at the time by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] without any substantial objection to the bill, I believe. Since that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that the Senator from Indiana on the right of the Chair [Mr. VOORHEES] indicated a disposition to speak on the pending resolution to-day, but he is not here, and if the resolution were informally laid aside the bill could be taken up.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask, then, that it be informally laid aside for the purpose of taking up the bill I have indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To that the Chair hears no objection. The Senator from Minnesota moves to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1152.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This matter has been submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in accordance with his suggestions I will offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether he has a communication upon the subject from the Interior Department? If so, let it be read.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes, sir, I have. I can state the substance of the communication if the Senator will be satisfied with that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1152) to extend the time for the payment of pre-emptors on certain public lands in the State of Minnesota and Territory of Dakota. It extends for two years from October 1, 1878, the time at which pre-emptors on the public lands in the State of Minnesota, including the lands within the Fort Ridgely and Sioux Indian reservations and the old Sioux Indian reservation in the county of Grant, Territory of Dakota, are now required to make final proof and payment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk, and I ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "seventy-eight," in line 9, at the end of the bill, it is proposed to insert:

In all cases where the pre-emptors shall make due proof before the register and receiver of the local land office in the district in which their lands are situated that their crops have been destroyed or seriously injured by grasshoppers within two years prior to October 1, 1878.

Mr. BECK. If there is a communication from the Department I should like very much to have it read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that it be read. The amendment is in accordance with the suggestion of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It restricts the extension to the cases mentioned in the amendment, as was intended to be done originally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish the communication read?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, yes; let it be read previous to voting on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 16, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on House bill 1152, "to extend the time for the payment of pre-emptors on certain public lands in the State of Minnesota and Territory of Dakota," which you referred to him for an expression of his opinion thereon, and to state that I concur in the views therein set forth.

Very respectfully,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
United States Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office accompanying the communication be also read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1879.

SIR: I have received from Senator PLUMB, of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, House bill No. 1152, entitled "An act to extend the time for the payment of pre-emptors on certain public lands in the State of Minnesota and Territory of Dakota," for an expression of opinion as to whether this office has any objection to the passage of the bill.

It is stated in the letter from Senator PLUMB accompanying the bill, that "it is designed to benefit those who suffered by the grasshopper invasion." If the bill should become a law it would doubtless have that effect, as by its terms, according to my interpretation of it, it extends the time alike to all pre-emption entries, whether they were such as suffered by reason of the grasshopper invasion or not. The policy of extending time to pre-emptors on the public lands for making their final payments is a matter for Congress to determine, and no expression of opinion by me as to such policy is deemed necessary. If such extension is to be granted, I know of no reason why it should not be general and extended to pre-emptions in every State and Territory. If, as stated in the letter of transmittal referred to, it is designed only for the benefit of those who suffered by the grasshopper invasion, I would respectfully suggest that the bill be amended by inserting, after the word "seventy-eight," in the ninth line, the following:

"In all cases where the pre-emptors shall make due proof before the register and receiver of the local land office in the district in which their lands are situated, that their crops have been destroyed by grasshoppers within two years prior to October 1, 1878."

The bill (H. R. No. 1152) is herewith transmitted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner.

Hon. CARL SCHURZ,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senate will observe that the amendment I have offered is in accordance with the suggestion of the Commissioner with the exception that I have inserted the words "seriously injured" instead of confining it to "totally destroyed." That is what was intended to be accomplished originally by the bill as introduced in the House, but the language was too general for that purpose, and it has been thus restricted. The measure refers only to certain portions of my own State and one county in Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask consent to take up for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, which was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read at length:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties and limitations provided in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia: Provided, That water-main taxes and water-rents shall be uniform in said District: And provided further, That the rate of interest specified in section 202 of said Revised Statutes shall be increased to 10 per cent. per annum from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to advance to said commissioners the sum of $25,000, to be reimbursed by payment into the Treasury of the United States, until said sum is paid in full, of all collections of water-main taxes now due said District; and the money so advanced shall be expended to improve the water supply on Capitol Hill.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the attention of the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill. I believe a similar measure was considered at the last session.

Mr. ROLLINS. A similar bill was considered at the last session and passed by the Senate. After some discussion an amendment was moved by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] which is substantially the first section of the present bill. It is simply to give the commissioners power to regulate the charges for water rents. It gives them full power. The same provision was adopted at the last session on the motion of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee at that time.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the honorable Senator explain upon what the rate of interest specified is increased to 10 per cent.?

Mr. ROLLINS. It is increased to 10 per cent. upon the amount still due on the charges for laying down the water-mains. The sum of $113,000 is still due, and it is found that with only 6 per cent. charged for interest it is impossible to collect the money. It is hoped that by increasing the rate of interest, those owing the money may be induced to pay it, so that the $25,000 proposed to be advanced may be very speedily refunded to the Treasury.

Mr. BAYARD. There is another small item here. In section 2 the bill provides that the sum of $25,000 shall be advanced to the commissioners by the Secretary of the Treasury, and expended in the improvement of the supply of water on Capitol Hill. I have no objection whatever to the improvement of the supply in that part of the town, but I have been made sometimes painfully aware of the lack of supply in other portions of the city. The water taxes are gauged upon the number of outlets applied in every house, upon all the premises, and yet at the same time there is a large portion of the city in which the supply of water is only nominal. I could name very long rows of houses in this town where the supply is but nominal, where the upper stories are never reached except in mid-winter, and at midnight in mid-winter. When the use of water is cut off by the cold, or when the great use of the water is cut off by the late hour of night, then and then only is a supply of water given in many portions of this town for which the full water-tax is demanded and paid. As long as the present system of taxation is continued we shall have a nominal supply of water for an actual tax. While it is very probable that there are portions of Capitol Hill that require an increased flood of water, it is not more true than that others need it in the same way.

I always rely upon the examination of the gentlemen specially charged with the consideration of this business; but I submit that there ought to be a more general improvement in the laying of water taxes in this town, where so large a portion is taxed for that which it never gets or gets so imperfectly as to make it scarcely a reliable source.

Mr. ROLLINS. I quite agree with most that the Senator from Delaware has said. It will be necessary in order to make the supply all that is desirable in the city probably to extend the conduit and enlarge the dam, incurring a very large expenditure, before the supply of water throughout the city will be all that is desirable. This subject has been under consideration for some time. Several plans have been proposed, but the matter has not yet been sufficiently considered to warrant the committee in reporting a bill to the Senate.

The object of this bill is to relieve a pressing necessity upon Capitol Hill and to authorize the commissioners to revise the water rates. If any Senator desires further information upon the subject I have here a letter from the commissioners addressed to the Speaker of the House, (the House having already passed this bill,) which can be read; but I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate by the reading unless some Senator calls for further information.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether it is proposed by the commissioners to raise largely the water rents?

Mr. ROLLINS. I do not think that it will be necessary to raise largely the water rents. I think by a revision of the rates, compelling those who use large quantities of water to pay according to the water they use, the amount of money required can be raised without very largely increasing the water rents; but that it is necessary there should be a revision of these rents is perfectly apparent. I think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. THURMAN, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) I wish a little explanation of this bill. The first clause provides:

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties and limitations provided in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia.

I have not that chapter before me and I would thank the Senator to tell me what are those powers, duties, and limitations which it is proposed to confer upon the commissioners.

Mr. ROLLINS. In one moment. I have sent for the statutes of the District of Columbia. I thought I had them here.

Mr. BAYARD. While the honorable Senator from Ohio is looking for the statutes, I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, who has the bill in charge, whether it would not be wiser to allow any portion of this $25,000 to be used not for one locality but for any locality in which there is a deficient water supply, in proportion to the tax? I ask the honorable Senator why is it that Capitol Hill, to the improvement of whose water supply I have no objection, should be selected as the part of the city in which to spend money to remedy the defective water supply when other portions of the city suffer just as much? I submit to the honorable Senator that the bill has not exactly that equity of legislation which is proper. I do not think that one portion of this town that suffers from defective water supply should be relieved any more than other portions that suffer from the same cause to the same extent.

Mr. ROLLINS. To what portion of the city does the Senator allude?

Mr. BAYARD. The bill expressly provides in the second section that the property on Capitol Hill shall have the expenditure of $25,000 addressed to it. Why should that be? I do not deny that there is a defective water supply for that portion of the city, but I also know that there are other portions of the town equally defective. Why, then, should the expenditure of this sum of money be restricted to the property on Capitol Hill when other portions equally taxed are equally in want of a water supply?

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Delaware if he knows as a fact that there are other portions of the city in which the supply of water is inadequate, as the fact is known that it has been inadequate for years, and is grossly inadequate, upon Capitol Hill?

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, yes, I have personal knowledge of the fact. The house that I occupy has no supply of water on the second and third stories, for which tax is collected, except it be at midnight, and sometimes in summer weather not even then; and it is necessary to have the expense and trouble of artificial methods of raising water by means of pumps in order to supply the bath-rooms &c., on the second and third stories. If that is the case at the point that I speak of, it is still more so as to residences on higher ground. Therefore I think I am very safe in saying to the Senator that there are other and extensive portions of property in this city taxed for water rates where the water supply is really nominal.

Mr. HARRIS. In answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Delaware——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ROLLINS. I have the statute now.

Mr. THURMAN. I have it now before me, and I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to some of its provisions. The bill provides:

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties and limitations provided in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia.

I supposed that they already had all those powers in the act creating the board of commissioners; but if they have not, then it is proposed to confer those powers upon them. It is proposed by this bill, as I understand, to have a revision of the water tax in the city of Washington. Water being the only cheap thing there is in Washington, it is proposed to make it a little dearer. How is that to be done? It is said there is great inequality, and I think there is inequality; but the inequality will not be remedied by this bill.

The difficulty in my mind, and to which I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire, is this: You make these laws applicable to the present board by giving them all the powers contained in this chapter 8, if they do not already possess those powers. It is said that it is necessary in order to remedy a great and gross inequality in the water tax in this city; for instance, that a person with very large premises and using a great deal of water pays no more tax than a person with the humblest tenement and who uses not one-tenth or one-twentieth the amount that is used by the large proprietor. Will this bill remedy that evil? Will it get rid of that inequality? Will it enable the board of commissioners to remedy it?

Let us see whether it will. They are to have the powers and they are to be subject to all the duties and limitations provided in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia. I will read some of the provisions of that chapter:

SEC. 199. A water tax may be levied and collected on all real property within the limits of the city of Washington, which binds or touches on any avenue, street, or alley in which a main water-pipe may be laid by the United States or by the District.

It is to be a tax on the real estate, not a personal tax, but a tax on the real estate. Then the next section is:

The water tax shall be as nearly as possible equal and uniform.

Then the very next section to that, section 201, provides that:

The water tax may be levied on lots in proportion to their frontage or their area, as may be determined by law, and may be collected in not less than three nor more than five annual installments.

Then it seems to be the contemplation of the act that this tax, which is to be a tax on real estate, must be levied or should be levied upon the frontage of the lots. If that is the true interpretation of the statute, then this bill will not remedy the difficulty at all, for it will still be a tax according to the number of front feet of the lot, and wholly irrespective of the amount of water that is used on the premises. It seems to me that there is very great obscurity in the measure. The bill itself provides:

That water-main taxes and water rents shall be uniform in said District.

I do not know what uniformity is meant by that provision, unless it is a uniform tax on the frontage of the lots or a uniform tax upon a given amount of water consumed, as, for instance, so much a gallon. That would be a uniform tax, but that does not exactly seem to be consistent with section 201, which provides for a tax upon the number of feet front in the lot. I will not say that section 201, which provides that the tax "may be levied," is compulsory; I will not say that it provides it shall be levied in that way; but it is obscure, and this bill I think will be more obscure.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that the tax upon the frontage of the lot is a tax levied for the purpose of paying for the water-mains. It is a tax that is levied but once; it is not an annual tax. It is for the laying of the water-mains that bring the water to the vicinity or to the place where it is used. Then the uniformity required in the water supply is an annual tax. I suppose uniformity there means that each spigot or faucet used in a house shall pay the same rate, the same amount, and uniformity is obtained in that way. Whether it be the wisest plan or not to levy the tax upon the frontage of the lot for laying these mains, such has been the policy, and such under that statute must be the policy hereafter under the House bill now under consideration; but it will be perfectly competent for the commissioners, as I understand, if this bill shall pass, to lay a uniform tax upon the water supply, depending upon the quantity of water that is used in each house in the city. Such at least is my construction of the act the Senator is commenting upon.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Tennessee is not entirely correct, the fact being that the cost of laying the water-mains is paid by the levy of a tax upon the square foot in the lot along the front of which the mains are laid. The Senator from Ohio is correct in saying that there is a tax levied by way of rent for water in accordance with the frontage of the lot, under the law as at present administered. But the commissioners of the District of Columbia addressed a letter to the committee, which was read when a similar bill was under consideration, in which they say they propose to change the entire system and to substitute for this frontage a certain "fixed amount to every private dwelling in which water is introduced, this payment to cover such fixtures as are usually found in the smaller class of houses now being built, and to charge a fixed amount for each spigot or faucet in excess of such usual number." The frontage tax for water rent is to be abolished, and in place of that a fixed rent is to be established to correspond with the number of faucets or spigots used, and consequently the amount of water distributed.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think the Senator from Kansas quite understood my statement. I am quite aware of the fact that in the regulations that have prevailed heretofore the annual water rent has been governed by the frontage of the lot supplied; but the point that I suggested was that under this statute that was not necessary, and if this bill passes the commissioners may regulate the annual water rents according to the rule that I suggested. That is the remedy to be found in the passage of this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no doubt that the Senator from Tennessee is correct in saying that they may do so if this bill pass, because one section of this eighth chapter is this:

The Legislative Assembly has authority to establish a scale of annual rates for the supply and use of the water apportioned to different classes of buildings, according to their size, dimensions, assessed values, exposure to fires, uses for dwellings, stores, shops, stables, manufactories, or other purposes, number of occupants, or consumption of water, measured by meter or otherwise, and to modify, alter, amend, increase, or reduce such scale, from time to time, and extend it to other description of buildings and establishments.

Undoubtedly if that power is conferred upon the commissioners by this act, thus reviving the powers that were given to the Legislative Assembly of the District when that body had an existence, they may require meters to be put in every house and measure the supply of water by a meter and charge according to the supply, so many gallons or the like.

My rising to this bill was more for the purpose of inquiry than anything else. I think it is a pretty large subject, and it is a bill that covers the interests of so many people here that it ought perhaps to have a little more consideration than this bill is likely to have in this morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the substance of the first section of this bill was passed by the Senate at the last session in the form of Senate bill No. 1529 of the Forty-fifth Congress as it was finally amended and passed. The first section of this bill was put on to bill No. 1529 as an amendment on my motion. On looking afterward at chapter 8, which is here again enacted, I came to the conclusion that the form of the bill as we sent it over—and it is the same as this bill—was too broad, for there are some sections in chapter 8 that confer powers upon the Chief of Engineers and not upon the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, and I do not think it would be wise to withdraw those powers from the Chief of Engineers and turn them over to the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Having discovered that excess of action that we, as I thought, had committed, I sent a note to the chairman of the House committee, the honorable Mr. BLACKBURN—I may refer to him as being of the last Congress—calling his attention to the fact that I thought my amendment went too far, and suggesting that he examine it and have it corrected if the bill were to pass the House. I see this bill has come from the House without the limitation which I suggested; and that was to except out of the powers here granted to the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers already invested by law in the Chief of Engineers; and I wish to move to amend this first section so as to make that exception. The thing goes on harmoniously and well under existing law, as to the powers of the Chief of Engineers, and I do not think, as far as I know, that they ought to be changed. If the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia has examined that question, and intends to withdraw the powers that the Chief of Engineers now has, then of course there may be a good reason for it.

Mr. HARRIS. According to the suggestion now made by the Senator from Vermont, and perhaps in some other respects, the Committee on the District of Columbia would have modified the House bill as it stands, but for the fact that that committee was of the opinion that to amend this bill at all was probably to defeat its passage at the present session. The supply of water is so grossly inadequate, especially on Capitol Hill, and the inconvenience by reason of that inadequacy is so great, that the Committee on the District of Columbia thought it best to pass the bill just as it comes from the House, giving to the commissioners of the District of Columbia the power to increase the water supply by laying down an additional main that is absolutely necessary, to which the money is confined, and that is the reason why it is confined to this expenditure upon Capitol Hill. The commissioners of the District of Columbia believe that the laying down of that additional main will so relieve the mains in other portions of the city as to make the supply in every other part of the city entirely adequate to the necessities of the city.

Now, if, in the opinion of the Senator from Vermont and the Senate, it is better to take the risk of losing the present bill at the present session, and subjecting the city to this inadequacy of water supply for the coming months between now and the time the next session of Congress shall meet, then we may undertake to change and to perfect the bill; but, in my own judgment, it is better that we pass the bill as it is, reserving of course the power that we have at all times to change and modify hereafter the bill as it now stands if experience shall show that such change and modification be necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am not able to agree with my honorable friend from Tennessee that it is a good thing to pass a law that is not entirely or substantially satisfactory on the theory that we may rectify it afterward. I do not think that is good legislation, and I think it must be a very extreme case indeed—and I feel sure my honorable friend will agree with me in general—that would justify us in resorting to such a step. I do not see any ground to apprehend that any proper amendment to this bill will not receive the approval of the co-ordinate branch of the legislative power of this Government. I am unable to appreciate the force of that argument.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator will allow me. It is not an apprehension that the co-ordinate branch of the legislative department will not approve of any proper amendment, but the apprehension is that during the present session no amendment that we may adopt will receive consideration, and it goes over as a necessary consequence until December.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I could do so without violating the proprieties that belong between the two Houses, I should say that I should have no doubt that the amendment I shall feel it my duty to propose in a moment or two going over to the House of Representatives would be immediately considered. Perhaps I do not violate any propriety in stating that in that way, because it is respectful to the House of Representatives and does not criticise in any way what they might do. Perhaps it would be wrong to say that I believe it would meet with unanimous approval afterward. Probably that would be wrong, and so I do not say it.

The present law in force for a great many years, even during the time when we undertook to set up and did set up a great structure of legislative government here that did not work at all, left in the Chief of Engineers the administrative power over the unnecessary and wasteful use of Potomac water, to which I believe a great deal of the short supply in the elevated parts of the town—Capitol Hill, and that part of the town where I reside—is due. This conservative power of preventing waste, &c., is found in section 214 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia in chapter 8, and also in section 219 of the same chapter; the first one I have named providing that—

In order to prevent unnecessary waste of Potomac water, and in order to more fully enforce the laws in relation to the distribution of the same, the Chief of Engineers is authorized, after giving notice, to shut off the water when such notice shall be disregarded from any places where a waste of water is occurring.

And section 219 provides that—

It is the special duty of the Chief of Engineers to bring to the notice of the attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, or to the grand jury, any infraction of the preceding section.

And that preceding section relates to unlawful tapping, &c., and drawing off water. It is well understood that these water-works were built by the United States, coming from Great Falls, a distance of sixteen miles, and that all the taxation upon the people of this city and of Georgetown in respect thereof, is not to pay off the cost of the original investment, but to pay for keeping up the structures and making such necessary extensions and ramifications of them as the state of population, &c., from time to time shall require—merely running expenses and extensions, so to speak. The United States having built this great and very excellent system which, with all its defects, provides this city with as good water perhaps as any city in the world is provided with, if we could only get it in the high places where some of us reside, the United States through its officer, the Chief of Engineers, has always had control of the administration of the aqueduct system, and in order to that control and to prevent wastage, &c., these statutes that I have referred to have been enacted.

I do not think it is right toward the Chief of Engineers or right for public interests to upset that system and make this administrative part of the affair a matter that belongs to the commissioners of the District of Columbia instead of the Chief of Engineers. His system is organized; it is well administered; it must exist in respect of all that part of the pipes and the dams and the reservoirs and the locks and gates, &c., that exist outside of the city. I think it would be unwise, therefore, to disturb the present arrangement of the law and of the administration of that service in the respects to which I have alluded, and I am quite sure that my honorable friend from Tennessee will agree with me about that.

I move to insert in this bill after the word "Columbia" where it occurs in line 6 of section 1 these words:

Excepting such powers and duties as belong to the Chief of Engineers.

That will leave the Chief of Engineers with precisely the duties that the law now imposes upon him, to which nobody has ever made any objection, and which are merely a part of the system that he must execute outside of the city; and I think it would produce confusion and misfortune to turn this power over to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and I say that without intending to reflect upon them at all. After they had got the necessary means and the necessary men to do it that the Chief of Engineers now has in one complete system, very likely they might do it; but there is no grievance or necessity for making the change and I think it would not work well. Therefore I make this motion and I hope my honorable friend from Tennessee will not oppose it upon the theory that it is likely to lose the bill because I am quite sure it will not.

Mr. HARRIS. I have merely to say that the only possible objection I could have to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont is the one I have already suggested, that it endangers the passage of the bill at the present session of Congress. That is the only objection I can have to the amendment suggested by the honorable Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment will leave the law in a perfect state of harmony as respects the management, the wastage, and so forth, and the operation of the works as they now exist.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I fear that no vote I can give upon this bill will express the wish or the judgment I have on the subject to which it relates. I believe that a wrong is involved in any possible plan or adjustment by which the people of the city of Washington or any one householder in Washington is compelled to pay for the use of water. I do not underrate the value of water or its desirableness as one of the fluids used by men. I do not mean my remark to apply to water generally, or to any water whatever except that foul, that unfit water which is brought through works which have cost an enormous sum of money and delivered in houses in the city of Washington to be used, not only to wash in, but to drink. Speaking of that water, I mean to say that I deem it a wrong, a thing inherently objectionable because of its dishonesty, its commercial dishonesty as well as otherwise, to charge people any price whatever for such water brought them through mains and from reservoirs which their money among others has helped to construct.

This water is brought from the Potomac River, a great river running swiftly above here, and shoaled in many places. It is liable therefore to be roiled and to have the fluctuant lighter material which lies at the bottom stirred up by rains, and thus is made for the time being unfit to drink. Because of that money was appropriated to build reservoirs, and there are three, if I mistake not, of large capacity, the object of these reservoirs being that, when the river is quiet and clear and the water pure, they may be filled, and when from storm or freshet the sediment at the bottom of the river is stirred up and the water rendered unfit for use, the flow may be shut off, and then resort may be had to the reservoir and the waters which have been kept there clean and pure, because coming there when the river was still and normal.

Now, with all that adjustment, what does every Senator know to be true? I heard a Senator say this morning that frequently he could not see the bottom of a tumbler when it was filled with this water, and I am not sure that that is too strong a statement. It is not fit, I repeat, to wash in, and yet it is the water delivered in this city to be drank.

Mr. President, I have heard a great deal in this Chamber, I have heard the Senator from Ohio who stands before me now [Mr. THURMAN] eloquent and emphatic when he talked about what had been done by the board of public works in the city of Washington. Whenever the Senator gets after a thing that he really thinks is wrong he strikes a very high rate of speed, and I have seen him under great action when he went for the board of public works as that historical character went for "the heathen Chinee." [Laughter.] I wish to say that in my belief, if the board of public works of the city of Washington had done what has been done down to this time about the water-works in the District of Columbia, and then the honorable Senator from Ohio should bend the bow and make that board of public works a mark for his arrow, praying never would save them.

I do not believe there is or has been about this city a more indefensible disconnection between cause and effect in the just application of moneys than in the instance to which I am referring. Ever since I first came to Congress appropriations have been going for these water-works, reservoirs, bridges, mains, all manner of things; one of them is here this morning; and there has never been one year, nor in my belief one season of one year, when the water brought here was fit for use even to wash or bathe in; and yet there never has been one year or one month in one year when it might not have been perfectly fit by the same care and the same management familiar in every one of half a dozen northern cities I could mention.

I wish the honorable Senator from Ohio would some time when his battle spirit is upon him, when he is in good voice, and when he feels that something generally ought to be rended and devoured, just go for these water-works once, so that I could have the pleasure of sitting by and hearing it set forth and shown accordingly by a man who really knows how.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour has expired. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask what he has drank for the last sixteen or eighteen years?

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to answer that question. The honorable Senator from Ohio inquires of me what I have drank for the last sixteen or seventeen years since I have been in Congress. I beg to say to the honorable Senator it is not that beverage so universally drank by the party of which he is the distinguished leader. [Laughter.] If he wishes me to be more definite than that, I am ready to be so; but in the mean time I think the real point which the Senator wishes to ascertain is conveyed in my answer,—never that beverage—I always avoid it.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from New York had only addicted himself to that beverage it would have liberalized his heart and made him a far more amiable man than he is, although he is already the incarnation of amiability. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. And also no doubt would have saved the expenses of a filter because I am told they do not filter it, but take it straight. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Texas to allow the consideration of the District water bill to proceed. I think it will take only a few moments to dispose of it now, and I should be glad to have the action of the Senate upon it. I hope the Senator from Texas who has the post-route bill in charge will consent that we may proceed with the consideration of this bill, and if it be found that it will take any considerable length of time, I will say more than thirty minutes, I will not trespass further on his indulgence.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the regular order will be proceeded with. After the affecting remarks of the Senator from New York I feel that this is a serious matter that we ought to consider with great care and caution. If we are drinking such horrible stuff we ought not to pay any more for it. It has been cheap heretofore. Perhaps we ought to raise the price in order to diminish the consumption of this very bad beverage that we have been drinking. But jocularity apart, Mr. President, I think this bill requires more consideration than we can give it in the short time suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. I hope the bill will go over and the regular order be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is before the Senate, unless there be a motion made to temporarily lay it aside.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate some bills from the House that ought to be referred to committees.

Mr. ROLLINS. Do I understand the Senator from Texas to consent that the regular order shall be laid aside according to the arrangement proposed by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. MAXEY. I have tried to get an opportunity to do so for some time, but have not succeeded as yet. The Senator from Tennessee has appealed to my courtesy to lay aside the regular order informally for a few minutes, saying that if it takes exceeding thirty minutes to complete the bill under consideration he will withdraw his call and allow the regular order to proceed. Under that agreement, and desiring to accommodate the Senator from Tennessee, I am willing to lay aside the regular order informally for thirty minutes to give an opportunity to have this water bill disposed of in that time.

Mr. THURMAN. I am perfectly satisfied this bill cannot be passed in thirty minutes, and I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is before the Senate unless there is a motion to postpone it.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall not make any motion to postpone. I had hoped to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed with the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has called for the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. If I cannot have unanimous consent I will not ask that the regular order be laid aside.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. LAMAR. I hope I shall be allowed to make a motion to refer House bill No. 1847 to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senator from Texas to allow us to have all the House bills on the table referred.

Mr. MAXEY. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the Senate some House bills for reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 1847) to provide for the appointment of a "Mississippi River commission" for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes near its mouth to its headwaters was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Misisippi River and its Tributaries.

The bill (H. R. No. 1478) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate for the purchase at private sale, or, if necessary, procure by condemnation, a site for a post-office in the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the international exhibitions to be held at Sydney and Melbourne, Australia, in 1879 and 1880, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EUROPEAN WORKING CLASSES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed 15,000 copies of the consular reports, with the letters of the Secretary of State transmitting the same, showing the rates of wages, hours of labor, prices of food, and general condition of the working classes in the several countries of Europe; 8,000 copies for the use of the House, 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Department of State; that of the said 15,000 copies 5,000 shall be bound in cloth and 10,000 shall be bound in paper.

COLONIAL CHARTERS AND CONSTITUTIONS.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to deliver to the Secretary of the Interior ten copies of the Colonial Charters and Constitutions of the United States, from those remaining in his possession.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes.

Mr. MAXEY. As I stated yesterday evening, there is nothing in this bill except the establishment of post-roads. Quite a number of amendments to the bill were placed by the Senate Post-Office Committee upon it, simply establishing post-roads, and they have been printed with the bill. A number of others have been presented since the bill was reported from the committee on the 29th of May, and which are not printed in the body of the bill. Unless it is desired to have the bill formally read, I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will have to be read to adopt the amendments. We have nothing else to do, and it is a very bad plan to pass any bill without reading. I do not doubt the Senator is perfectly correct in his statement, but for the mere honor of the thing we had better read every bill.

Mr. MAXEY. It was only to save trouble that I made the proposition. I have no objection to having the bill read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is no trouble. I shall listen to it with pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that as the bill is read the amendments of the committee be acted on as they are reached in the reading.

Mr. MAXEY. I think we shall get along much better by going through with the amendments as printed in the bill and adopting them, and then other amendments can be proposed after those are through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read and the amendments of the committee acted on as they are reached in the reading in their order.

From O'Neil City to Chelsea.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I had an amendment referred to the committee this morning of which I gave notice yesterday. I hope it will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky was referred to the committee and is in charge of the committee.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment, I suppose, may be considered as formally referred to-day, which would not be a compliance with Rule 38; but, after what took place yesterday, I do not propose to avail myself of the technical advantage I have under that rule. The amendment, as I understand from the Senator from Kentucky, is substantially that which was presented by him to the Senate on the 15th of May, 1878, a little over a year ago. It has never been presented to this committee, never has been in the possession of the present committee of which I am chairman, until the notice was given that it was considered referred to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Kentucky a copy of the amendment? The Chair has not the amendment nor has the Secretary.

Mr. MAXEY. I have it here I believe.

Mr. BECK. That is the one I referred this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky offers an amendment, which will be reported for information.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, as follows:

That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized to place such mail service upon any public highway, river, or railroad within the United States as the public service may require; and such public highways, rivers, and railroads are hereby declared post-roads so soon as said mail service is placed thereon.

Mr. BECK. That is a substitute for the whole bill. I have heard it said that there was some constitutional objection to the amendment. I have never looked at the question from a legal or constitutional stand-point; but as no service ever is placed on any post-route until the Postmaster-General sees fit to place it there, and only such service as he thinks the necessities of the country require is placed there after it is established, and as we seem to be able to do this in detail from one creek to another and from one little place to another that nobody knows anything about, and as all the railroads of the United States now are post-roads, and as all the navigable rivers are post-roads, I am unable to see why the public highways should not be made post-roads, and let such service be placed upon them from time to time as the necessities of the country require, instead of going through what we are going through to-day and what we go through at every session of Congress—a long detailed list of roads that nobody knows anything about nor cares anything about. I believe under the rules of the House of Representatives they are handed to the Clerk there and put on, and here they are put on without the members of the committee caring much about them, and, indeed, the members of the Senate themselves hardly knowing where the places are. I have heard of some routes in Kentucky; no doubt the places exist, but I do not think either my colleague or myself could guess within forty miles of where they are. It would be far better for the Senate, if this general measure can be constitutionally enacted, to have it so done; but I confess now I have not looked at it.

Mr. RANSOM. I wish my friend would allow his amendment to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the amendment be again reported, which will be done.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. BECK. It may be that my proposition is not artificially drawn, but the general idea was to stop all this, it seems to me very unnecessary, waste of time of the Senate. If there is any objection to it, I say again that I confess I have never examined it.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I suggested yesterday evening—and I suppose it is to that the Senator from Kentucky refers, and I see the RECORD makes me state it affirmatively—that the measure proposed by him was unconstitutional. My purpose, of course, was not to affirm that it was unconstitutional, but to state it suggestively, to raise a query, to indicate something of a doubt in my mind as to whether or not a measure like that proposed by the Senator from Kentucky was constitutional, as I had very grave doubts about it.

Mr. CONKLING. In what respect?

Mr. MAXEY. I will endeavor to point out as clearly and as concisely as I can wherein.

It will be remembered that under the Articles of Confederation there was no power given to Congress to establish post-roads. Power alone was given for the establishment of post-offices. By reference to the debates in the convention which framed the Constitution the Senator will find no light thrown upon that subject, nor in the Federalist. There is but one single sentence, I believe, in the Federalist that refers to it, that is the last paragraph, forty-second number, by Mr. Madison. The Senator will remember that there have been two distinct theories in the United States as to the power of Congress under the clause to establish post-offices and post-roads which are divergent, one of which may properly be said to be represented by Mr. Monroe, and the other perhaps better than by any other one man by Mr. Clay. The two theories are entirely divergent. Both agree as to the power of Congress to establish post-roads, that is to say to use roads as such which have been established by State authority, and many able men insist that here the power stops, but the other theory goes further and contends that Congress has the power to build these roads, and to build just such dirt roads, turnpikes, or railroads as the wisdom of Congress may deem most expedient.

This point in studying upon this matter suggested itself, that whenever the United States Government establishes a post-road it has a right of way over that road, and the State cannot interfere with the right of way of the United States Government over that road for postal purposes. So far as all the purposes of carrying the mails over that road are concerned, the United States is supreme to the State. It was probably for this reason that under the articles of confederation the power was not given to Congress at all to establish post-roads. It was given under the Constitution of the United States, if I remember correctly; and if I am wrong some Senator will correct me, by a vote of six States to five. There were but six States in favor of giving Congress any power whatever to establish post-roads against five who were opposed to it, believing that it might infringe upon the rights of the States. There is a very interesting discussion of that question, and I shall certainly not trouble the Senate with reading it at this late hour, to be found in the third edition of Story on the Constitution, commencing at page 68, second volume, but I will read two or three sentences to give the idea that I have upon this subject:

It may be said that unless Congress have the power the mail roads might be obstructed or discontinued at the will of the State authorities. But that consequence does not follow; for when a road is declared by law to be a mail road the United States have a right of way over it, and until the law is repealed, such an interest in the use of it as that the State authorities could not obstruct it.

Here at once we see what might occur. So good a lawyer as the Senator from Kentucky must see that it might be the policy of Congress to discontinue a mail-route, and all that Congress would have to do would be to simply repeal the law establishing that road as a post-road, and then all the rights over that road would instantly revert to the State, whereas if you make by one single act every road in the United States a mail-route although you might have many of them useless still you would have difficulty in discontinuing them unless you repealed the whole law which established all the roads.

The terms of the Constitution—

Says Mr. Justice Story—

The terms of the Constitution are perfectly satisfied by this limited construction, and the power of Congress to make whatever roads they may please, in any State, would be a most serious inroad upon the rights and jurisdiction of the State.—2 Story on the Constitution, 73.

An interesting point is made as to the rights of the State and its citizens in 7 Dana (Kentucky) Reports, in which the court of appeals hold that the power of Congress to establish post-roads enables them to make, repair, keep open, and improve post-roads, but that the United States have no right to adopt and use roads, bridges, and ferries constructed and owned by States, corporations, or individuals, without their consent, without just compensation to the parties concerned. And Chancellor Kent, in his twelfth lecture, volume 1, page 287, note A, says this important decision was well supported by sound reasoning.

Now, if the United States have the right at one single dash of the pen to create every road in this whole country a post-road, it would be, in the language of Mr. Justice Story, a most serious inroad upon the rights and jurisdiction of the States. My view of this subject is difficult to move, believing as I do that every power granted to the Federal Government constitutes the Government to the extent that the granted powers are given supreme; but that all other powers not granted are reserved either to the States or the people, and I do not propose to go beyond what, in my judgment, was the design and intent of the Constitution. Then Mr. Story says "it never could have been contemplated;" that is, to grant Congress this control over all roads. So I think. Therefore I leave that point with the remark that I do not think the Constitution ever contemplated transferring this great power to the Post-Office Department, which is the point at issue.

I will not undertake to state that the Senator from Kentucky is presenting a measure which is not constitutional; yet I do say that to my mind his proposition is not clear. It is a proposition which should be carefully looked into, it should be carefully investigated, it should come in as a substantive independent measure, and it should come in at a time when we would all have the opportunity of hearing the great lawyers of this body discuss so grave a question.

Again, Mr. President, I have been in the habit of looking at a long unbroken construction, passing through years, and in this case through eighty-seven years, all construing the law exactly one way, as justly entitled to great weight. Congress after Congress, beginning with the first under the Constitution, the federal party when it was in power, the democratic party when it came into power, the whig party when it was in power, and the republican party—all parties—have construed the law precisely as we are to-day trying to carry it out. Certainly we should halt and study about it before we set all this aside.

I should like to show in addition to what I have stated that there are some good historical reasons for retaining the law as it is. One of the best tables of statistics showing the progress of this country from the foundation of the Government under the Constitution is that which is made up on the very subject which we are now discussing. I will state here that the first regular post-office established in the colonies by Parliament was in 1710. In 1683 Penn granted an order for a post-road from Philadelphia to New Castle, and that the first post-route bill that was passed under the Constitution was in the year 1792, and that went on just exactly as we go on to-day, establishing post-roads by name. There was another bill passed in 1794, which followed the same rule; another one in 1797, and another one in 1799, which simply declared that where there were two or more roads leading from the same point to a given point the Postmaster-General might select either, which is the law now.

In 1790 there were seventy-five post-offices in the United States; eighteen hundred and seventy-five miles of post-roads. The revenue derived from that Department was $37,935. The expenditures of the Department were $32,140. The salaries of postmasters were $8,198. There were paid for the transportation of mails $22,081. That was in 1790, just after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. I omit the intermediate years, which show step by step the advance of the country, and pass to the year 1878, the last reported.

Nearly ninety years after, in 1878, there were 39,258 postmasters in the United States; 301,966 miles of post-road; $29,277,517 revenue from that Department; $34,165,084 expenditures for that Department; $7,977,852 salaries of postmasters; and paid for the transportation of the mails $19,262,421. Let any one contrast these statistics of 1790 and 1878 and he will see the wonderful progress of our country.

So far as expenses are concerned, the expenses of this bill are already in a measure concluded. The pending bill passed the House of Representatives, it went to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, it has passed through that committee, it has been printed, it is now in the Senate, and there is nothing to do but simply to pass the bill; there is no additional expense. My judgment is, if you transfer this great power which belongs to Congress to the Postmaster-General, you will require, not one clerk, not five clerks, but you will require twenty clerks more in order to keep up correspondence with every part of the country to ascertain what are State roads. Again I say to the Senator from Kentucky, that, broad and sweeping as his measure is designed to be, it is not so broad as the law as it now stands.

The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky proposes to authorize the Postmaster-General to place "mail service upon any public highway, river, or railroad within the United States as the public service may require; and such public highways, rivers, and railroads are hereby declared post-roads." As a matter of course public rivers, highways, and railroads being named, other ways are excluded. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. The mail service over canals and over lakes would be excluded. The law as it now stands provides for "the mail to be carried in any steamboat or other vessel used as a packet on any of the waters of the United States," so that the law as it stands is a better law than that which the Senator proposes.

But I beg that the Senator will not now insist upon his amendment, for he would injure, I think, every State that wants to get routes established by this bill. I am entirely sure that whether there be any merit in the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky or not—and I am not prepared to say now that there is not; I prefer to travel the road which our ancestors have traveled from the foundation of the Government down to the present time—I would rather look into this proposition and not tack it on here, and not pass on this bill—a substantive, independent measure—which in its very nature repeals the law as it stands on the statute-book and starts out from now upon an entirely new system.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the object I had in introducing the amendment was to endeavor to see if we could not in one bill in a general way do what we are doing with so much elaboration and detail. Of course Congress can establish a post-route wherever it pleases, without asking the consent of any State, and the Postmaster-General is not obliged to put service on the established post-routes unless he thinks the good of the public requires it. I suppose not one-half of the post-routes now established are of any sort of good. We establish as a post-route anything that any member of Congress or Senator desires, and the Postmaster-General puts on such service as he pleases, and does as much as he pleases and no more. All the railroads of the United States were made by one sweeping act post-routes. The moment a railroad is extended twenty miles, the postal service is extended with it. The navigable rivers I understand are in the same condition and are treated in the same way. Therefore I sought to save the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and certainly it would save me and every Senator and Representative immense trouble in going over the details of a post-route bill if this could be done. But having called attention to that fact, and as the committee seem to think that perhaps it would interfere with their bill, I will withdraw the amendment I have offered, submitting to their discretion.

Mr. MAXEY. I will say with all deference to the Senator from Kentucky that if he will give us an opportunity to investigate the question at the next session, I will give my word that the committee will investigate it to the bottom.

Mr. BECK. I withdraw the amendment and will send it to the committee at the next session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky has been withdrawn.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 572) to amend an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places of holding courts in said districts."

This bill is the unanimous report of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. ALLISON rose.

Mr. GARLAND. If the Senator from Iowa desires any other special business to be proceeded with, I will simply ask that the bill be taken up now and laid aside informally so as to be first in order to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to the matter being taken up, to be proceeded with in the morning. Unless some other Senator desires to present something to the Senate, I wish to move an executive session.

Mr. GARLAND. It is the understanding, then, that this bill be taken up, so that it shall be the unfinished business for to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be reported to the Senate for information and for its action.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARLAND. I will now agree that it be laid aside so as to be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. BAYARD. Pending the consideration of the bill, which I understand is now before the Senate, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 3, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL DOMER, D. D., of St. Paul's Lutheran Church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I rise to ask that by unanimous consent the call of States for bills and resolutions may be continued from the point where it ended yesterday. I ask that the call be proceeded with as part of the morning hour or previous to the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. If the call will only include bills and joint resolutions I will not object; but if the Speaker would allow resolutions other than joint resolutions to be introduced, I object.

The SPEAKER. There cannot be a qualified objection.

Mr. DUNNELL. My request includes simply bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. ACKLEN. If the call is to form part of the morning hour or to dispense with the morning hour, I object.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour cannot be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote of the House; but unanimous consent is equivalent to such a dispensing with the morning hour.

Mr. DUNNELL. I trust the gentleman from Louisiana will not insist on his objection.

Mr. ACKLEN. I withdraw my objection if it is understood that the call will not form part of the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I object, unless the Chair asks that the call be for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions only.

Mr. DUNNELL. That is all the request I have made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any qualified request for unanimous consent.

CORRECTION OF RIVER AND HARBOR ACT.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 435) to correct the reading of an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1879. This is a bill simply to correct a clerical error in the river and harbor act passed by last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879, as provides for the survey of "Chattahoochee" River, between Geneva and Newton, in Alabama, be, and the same is hereby, corrected so as to read, "Choctawhatchee" River, Alabama, from Geneva to Newton.

Mr. REAGAN. The object of the bill is simply to correct a clerical error. If it is not done now it will be too late.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

LEAVE TO VOTE.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WARD, be allowed to have his name recorded on the three yea-and-nay votes of yesterday. He was absent from the House on the supposition that I was paired with him. I voted; and I ask unanimous consent that he may have the privilege to record his vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. This will not change the result, I suppose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; none of the votes on yesterday were so close that this would change the result.

There was no objection.

Mr. WARD. On the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill in relation to the tobacco tax I vote "no." On the motion to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution in relation to the international exhibitions at Sydney and Melbourne I vote "ay." On the motion to adjourn I vote "no."

Mr. BAYNE. I ask leave to have my vote recorded.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object.

Subsequently, the objection having been withdrawn by Mr. DUNNELL was renewed by Mr. SIMONTON.

NEW YORK SHIPPING COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE.

Mr. COVERT. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of three members of this House be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the conduct of the shipping commissioner's office at the port of New York, and that the said committee is hereby empowered to send for persons and papers necessary to the pursuit of the inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the resolution be referred to a committee if the gentleman from New York wants its reference.

Mr. CONGER. I object to any special committee undertaking an inquiry on that subject.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask leave to introduce a private bill for reference. I was not here yesterday when my State was called.

Mr. CONGER. I have asked for the regular order. I withdrew my objection to the introduction of bills for reference provided the unanimous consent applied only to bills and joint resolutions. Gentlemen object to that restriction, and I therefore insist on the regular order. If it is agreed that the call shall be only for bills and joint resolutions, I have no objection.

Mr. McMAHON. I think the gentleman should let me introduce this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I do not see any reason why the gentleman's bill should come in in preference to others.

Mr. McMAHON. It is the gentleman's privilege to be mean.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at nineteen minutes to one o'clock, and the business coming over from the last morning hour is the consideration of the bill, reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, with amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I demand the previous question upon the pending motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, and I will renew the demand for the previous question at the close of the hour. I desire to speak on the test-oath question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. With the understanding that the demand for the previous question is renewed at the end of his remarks, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The motion pending is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CONGER. I think that when this subject was last up, there was no quorum voting on that question.

The SPEAKER. The adjournment of the House vacated that proceeding.

Mr. COX. Has not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] a right to yield to me.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to have it stated what the last pending motion was upon which the House voted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Speaker then proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, and announced the first business in order under said call to be the bill of the House (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts, reported from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws on the 10th instant, and pending when the morning hour expired; the pending question being the demand of Mr. URNER for the previous question on the bill and amendments;

When,

Mr. TOWNSHEND withdrew the said demand and moved the reference of the bill and amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on which latter motion he demanded the previous question.

And the question being put thereon,

No quorum voted.

And then,

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND,

Ordered, There be a call of the House.

The roll having been called, the following named members failed to answer to their names:

* * * * * * *

Mr. ACKLEN moved that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with;

And the question being put,

It was decided in the affirmative.

* * * * * * *

So the motion was agreed to, and all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The question recurring on the demand of Mr. TOWNSHEND for the previous question,

Pending which,

The morning hour expired.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has a right to yield to me.

The SPEAKER. He has a right to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That can be done with the understanding that the demand for the previous question shall be made before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. COX. I will renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Does that leave the bill open for amendment?

The SPEAKER. The bill will be open for amendment, if the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] does not renew the demand for the previous question, as he indicated he will do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have not yet yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House had better come to an understanding on the subject. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] desires to speak, and will thus occupy time which might be wasted by motions of a dilatory character.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the Chair will not characterize the saving of the passage of this bill to the country a waste of time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair expressed no opinion on the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest that there be some arrangement of a reciprocal character, so that if any gentleman desires to speak on this side he may have an opportunity of doing so.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that if gentlemen want to speak upon this bill the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will allow amendments to be offered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am willing to allow debate and amendments, and it was with that view that I moved to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; that was done for the purpose of allowing amendments and debate.

Mr. CONGER. If it be in order I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the demand for the previous question is sustained, and the bill is referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I am perfectly willing that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] shall be considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that technically, under the rules, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has the right which he desires to exercise; but the Chair suggests that the House come to some understanding on the subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. FRYE. Would it not be entirely in accord with parliamentary rules for unanimous consent to be given to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to occupy the morning hour in a speech?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the manner proposed to be proceeded with by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is in order.

Mr. CONGER. But then the moment an objection was made, if the speech was on an entirely different subject from the bill——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] would then have to stop.

Mr. CONGER. My friend from New York would be embarrassed, and I dislike very much to have him embarrassed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there had better be an understanding on each side that one hour be allowed to gentlemen on each side——

Mr. GARFIELD. That is a good arrangement. Let the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] make his speech this morning, and I presume that some one on this side of the House will be ready to follow him in the next morning hour.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. With the understanding that the demand for the previous question is not withdrawn.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not to interfere with the condition of the bill.

Mr. REED. The bill to remain in a sack as now.

The SPEAKER. The status of the bill will be preserved.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I understand that the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is that unanimous consent be now given that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] shall be allowed to occupy the floor for the morning hour of to-day, and that to-morrow some one on the other side shall occupy the floor, without a withdrawal of the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Without interfering with the present parliamentary status of this question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The previous question not to be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. CONGER. I desire it to be distinctly understood——

Mr. GARFIELD. No change in the condition of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. Wait a moment; let me say a word. [Laughter.] I do not propose to have any arrangement made that will at all interfere with the understanding on this side of the House that we do not intend that this bill, either by a vote upon it or through the proposed amendment to the rules submitted by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] or by any other possible proceeding, shall go one step beyond where it now is.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is, if you can help yourself.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] a fair question, and I want a candid answer to it. Is it true, as has been whispered upon this floor and upon the streets and has found expression in the public prints, that it is the purpose of the republican side of this House to prevent action at this session of Congress on this bill or on any other bill or resolution, except such modifications of the appropriation bills as may suit the views of the minority of this House and of the President? I desire to ask the gentleman if that is correct.

Mr. CONGER. Without being authorized to speak for gentlemen on this side of the House at all, I think I may say that every man on this side of the House is prepared to listen to the universal demand of men throughout the country of all political parties, that no legislation except in regard to appropriation bills, for which we were called together in this session, shall be proceeded with, but that we shall adjourn after the appropriation bills are passed. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I understand that dilatory motions will be resorted to against any other bill or resolution as well as against this one.

Mr. CONGER. When the other bill comes in we will inform the gentleman what our course will be.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then let me say this much, in answer to the gentleman. I want to repeat the language used in the Forty-third Congress by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] when his party was in the majority, and when the minority were delaying action on a bill by dilatory motions. He said then that the action of the minority in seeking to delay action upon a bill by filibustering or dilatory motions was revolutionary, was an overthrow of parliamentary government. I repeat his language here to-day for the benefit of gentlemen on the other side who are seeking to delay action on this or other bills by the same method.

Mr. REED. If you would repeat more of the language of the gentleman from Ohio it would be a great improvement on your speeches.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. Is this discussion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the proposition, which the Chair understands to be agreed to by unanimous consent, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] shall occupy the floor for this morning hour, and the next morning hour shall be occupied by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to say that there are men on this side of the House who are not in entire sympathy with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Confounded few of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEAVER. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not consider that the understanding between the two sides as to the occupation of two morning hours in debate includes the right to offer amendment to the bill. The Chair, therefore, will not recognize at this time the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] to offer an amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is recognized as entitled to the floor under the agreement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] proceeds, I desire to say that we are willing to allow the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] to be offered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will now proceed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, for this unusual courtesy I thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the House. I shall endeavor to speak on a theme which will not arouse partisan asperity and controversy. It connects itself with the bill now in the morning hour. This is a bill to limit the expense, business, and jurisdiction of the Federal courts. Until these courts are so reinstituted as to give a fair jury trial—by a better jury panel and a repeal of the test oath—I can never agree to the enlargement of its jurisdiction or the increase of its business. Therefore I speak to-day for fair jury trial.

Mr. Speaker, one of the comprehensive remarks of De Tocqueville as to our institutions is that "the people gave legislative and executive power as well as franchises to jurors." He associates public freedom with the sacred right of trial by jury, and in their union finds the democracy of America. Herein is the directing power of our Government, shining through all its forms. In thus defining the "spirit of the laws," he followed the eulogy of Montesquieu and the unstinted praise of Coke and Blackstone upon the jury system.

Wherever this system has been transplanted it grew. It was never given up when once planted. France got it out of the very stones and bayonets of the barricades of 1830, and holds it. I have seen its utility exemplified in Algiers among the indigenes. Belgium in 1830 rose in insurrection when it was interfered with; the country was severed in twain for its vindication. It is probably a growth out of Teutonic soil, and is both the cause and proof of civilization and liberty.

Indispensable to this democracy of the jury-box is the removal of physical force, supple servility, and proscriptive laws. Time will show whether or not the party which would dwarf the development of our representative system, coerce and hinder the ballot, and pollute and degrade the jury, shall be temporary or perpetual. The thousand small shades of difference on questions of administration are nothing before the questions involved in a free ballot and a fair jury. That party which would distrust the intelligence and check the will of the community, either in the jury-box or ballot-box, must in the end be checked and yield to that party which would enlarge the popular authority that resides in both. Beneath all our throes, beneath the surface of our society, there are depths which constitute the very soul of public liberty.

PRIMARY TRUTHS.

However we may differ as to the modes of carrying out these primordial truths of our social system, however much our society may fluctuate, and be shaken or controlled for the moment by force or fraud, I have faith to believe that the party which holds the lofty thought and hurtless weapon of free ballot and a fair jury, will rise above all the prejudices of faction and the hates of civil war.

The citizens of this country have always been taught, until an abnormal condition grew out of our sectional contention, to rely upon their own willing judgment, unshackled by force and uncurbed by official meddling. The mass of our people, whatever may be said, will never long be dazzled with any glittering federal government, especially when their home interests are at stake. There are no considerations of party supremacy or personal interests which will pay them for the loss of a free ballot and a fair trial.

REVOLUTION!

In view of these propositions, how childish is the clamor that the attempt of Congress to sponge from the statutes odious restrictions upon the popular will, like force at the polls and test oaths in the courts, is Revolution! How idle the veto which promises not to use such force and which declares that no law exists to authorize it, and yet would preserve it for some ulterior and sinister purpose! To veto such a measure so plainly expressed is no more revolution than the legislation vetoed.

Sir, the genius of our Republic, unlike that of other nations, ancient and modern, is not revolution; it is rather mutability. Revolution threatens the existence and accomplishes the ruin of a government. Change, if it be a foe at all to good government and republican institutions, is only a temporary obstacle to a better and more stable policy. But a permanent change of the national spirit and elemental liberties of a people is revolution. Our Proteus is not dangerous, however variable. The American idea is the peaceful revocation of discerned wrongs, to conform to our constant growth and new conditions. It would prevent bad laws or repeal them; and it may and does often prevent good laws. There is no excessive legislation that is not obnoxious, but it does not follow that it is revolutionary.

Mr. Speaker, the great difficulty with our opponents is, that there has been a change which is not revolution. They have lost control; but the government is not overturned or lost. Parties come and go, but principles and organisms survive and are strengthened by the movement. Rufus Choate gave a definition to revolution, worthy of himself:

I take it, sir, that so stupendous a transaction as revolution for good or evil, announces itself pretty unequivocally. If that great sea lifts itself up, and that sky darkens, and that not very imitable thunder rolls, mankind hear and see it. It is a tempest, which overturns and successfully resists the existing authority, arrests the exercise of supreme power, introduces by force and by a resort to the primary right of nature, a new, paramount authority into the rule of state.

Do gentlemen say that the enacting of an Army bill, with a rider, abolishing certain abuses which grew out of the war; or, as we now have it, of a separate bill for that purpose, is that inimitable and tempestuous revolution which overturns public authority?

Will any one tell me that the effort to bring into the jury-box honest and intelligent men and repeal the test by which they are excluded, is such a stupendous and thunderous exercise of supreme power, through force and a resort to the primary right of nature, that a new, paramount authority is introduced into the rule of state? How can any one allege this condition to be revolution? It is not overturning. It is uprighting!

In one sense we have a revolution every year in our affairs. It is the happy consequence of the exquisite automatic machinery of our system. It has its principle of compensation. The motion is not broken; it is not stopped or retarded. Its irregularities only are corrected. But it is not the inimitable revolution such as astounded and changed a dynasty and restored old liberties to England in 1688. It is not the denial of dependence upon a crown by a nation at once springing into life, armed cap-a-pie, by its "declaration," as in America in 1776. It is not the red flood which in France in 1798 whelmed licentious monarchs and vampire nobles, and swept away tithes, seignorial dues, gabel, game laws, feudalities, colonial slavery, and old landmarks, to institute a new order. These were indeed inimitable and tempestuous.

We look in vain for any evidences of this kind of revolution around us this extra session and since these debates began. Will not seedtime and harvest pass and come again; men and women be married and given in marriage; children be born as usual; the summer solstice follow the vernal equinox, and autumn clad in her familiar russet lead the way for gray and frosty winter, and the hours press down as ever, to the lips of thankless men, the prodigality of nature for their sustenance and felicity? There are revolutions in all these phenomena. Yonder clock, as it marks the hours, revolves, but it does not startle us by its regular movement. The sun moves in the heavens and gives us the dawn and the evening, with all the splendors of the one and the repose of the other; but this kind of revolution is not of the tempestuous and inimitable kind. It is only the debate which is so stormful. But if after such a debate comes such a calm, let the sea, sky, and thunder do their worst. No one will be harmed.

BOND-SELLING AND REVOLUTION.

Revolution! "Oh," said Disraeli, "there is nothing like a fall in consols to bring the blood of our good people of England into cool order. It is your grand state medicine—your veritable Dr. Sangrado." I should be inclined to reverse the statement, and say that the rise in our bonds ought to cool the ardent rhetoric of those who cry out that the Republic is endangered. Does it indicate peril and dismay when our Secretary of the Treasury boasts of placing, since the 1st of January, $750,000,000 of our four percents at a half per cent. premium? Let us welcome such a revolution if it establish still higher the national credit. If the democratic ascendency and its natural outcome in the repeal of tyrannical laws against the free choice of our public servants in our Federal courts and Legislature, thus lift up the nation upon a higher plane, in the eyes of its most suspicious citizens who deal in bonds and moneys, and in the eyes of foreign nations who look at our general conduct, mellowed by distance—then let such revolutions be frequent and perpetual!

The revolution which gentlemen have apprehended is not felt by any but timid nerves, nor seen by any but those bent on partisan mischief and perpetual misrule. It is the misbegotten offspring of legislative babbling, the affectation by a partisan opposition of a fear never felt. No such result from these measures of repeal is possible. What is the ostensible cause of this terrible cry of revolution? It is the attempt to repeal a class of statutes, which where they are not tyrannical are absurd.

Even the colored brother, in sight of the Freedman's Bank, besieges the doors of the Treasury in mobs for the ten-dollar certificates daily. They wait from cock-crow to the dewy eve—hired it may be at seventy-five cents per $100—to obtain from the Treasury its printed credits to fill the broker and bank demand. What to him are the alluvium of the Kansas bottoms? His hopes are bottomed on our bonds. What to him is the imaginary mule on an invisible farm of forty acres for his fanciful needs? The animal is the creature of his interior consciousness, and the forty acres are as nebulous as a castle in Spain!

OUR INFAMOUS ELECTION LAWS.

We have a code of Federal election laws. It counts up thirty sections. A few of them only are touched by the proposed repeal, some fourteen only. We have another code of "crimes against the elective franchise and civil rights of citizens." It contains twenty-seven sections, and but one is now proposed to be repealed and one modified. Then there is a law to use armies at the polls and the test-oath law as to jurors.

Let the repeal, if not complete now, reach as far as it can. Certainly it will be a relief to be rid of these laws against the freedom and fairness of the ballot and jury-box; and, for one, I would not stop till the whole of this blasting and plague-creating upas tree, with its many envenomed roots, trunks, and branches, is girdled and dead. They all have the same object, to poison the representative system.

THE DEVIL-FISH—AN ANALOGY.

These manifold and cunning contrivances against the popular expression may be likened to nothing so analogous in nature as the famous devil-fish. Its beak is like the mandibles of a hawk, and fitly represents the sword at the polls. The long radiating feelers, whose underside is armed with hidden rows of sharp-pointed hooks, represent the insidious, cruel machinery used to deter and capture voters, while the veritable talons at their end are the test oath and jury juggle, by which the prey when enmeshed, is dragged in by the supervising and marshaling tentacles of this slimy octopus. Even after the creature is dead, these suckers have an ugly and hideous vigor, which fitly represents a veto of the popular and representative will. As one by one we try to relieve the body-politic of this monstrous network of wrong, the writhing becomes as harmless as it is sublime in its blind fury. To detach from the States these long and stifling claws and arms is not revolution!

THE IRON-CLAD OATH.

Is it not monstrous, that even in our Revision of the Laws (section 821) so hateful a test should still remain to blacken our statute-books? What does that section require of the officers of the Federal courts? To every grand and petit juror an oath should be tendered, known as the "iron-clad." What is that oath? That the juror has not taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States, giving it aid and comfort; that he has not given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person whom he knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion. The oath further goes to the extent of refusing jury duty to those who gave money to those who have resisted or to be about to resist with force of arms the execution of the laws of the United States. He is required to swear that he has not counseled or advised any one to join in insurrection or rebellion. Whoever refused to take that oath could not serve on the grand or petit jury. This law was passed in June, 1862, after one section had become involved in the civil struggle, and a line of force existed between one-third of our people and the remainder. It remains still, after that struggle has been ended and the line erased. It nullifies a fair, intelligent jury trial. What a glaring absurdity!

How apparent this absurdity is now, when there are three judges if not more, Judge Settle of North Carolina, Judge Hughes of Virgina, and Judge Hammond of Tennessee—in fact there are some twenty judges and district attorneys in all—who administer this law, and who themselves cannot take the oath they require of others. A person may be President of the United States, nay, we have now a member of the Cabinet, and have had others in the Cabinet, who cannot and could not take the oath without perjury. How many in this House could take it but for a special modification of the law?

The mischiefs which we intended to remedy by this repealing legislation cohere around the ballot. Of the pending questions of our extra session this has been least discussed. I beg to refer to it elaborately—I mean jury trial and the test oath. It is well known that arrests have been made of hundreds of our people in certain States for the alleged breach of the Federal election laws. There were some four hundred in Louisiana, one hundred in South Carolina, and perhaps as many in Florida and Maryland, in 1878. These persons are held for trial; and the jurors summoned have been put to the inquisition, by the test oath of loyalty to which I have referred. Charges have been made against democratic citizens South and North, but especially in the South. Almost a reign of terror spread through Florida, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Maryland. Men have been dragged into court under various pretexts, and sought to be put on trial by jurors who, with facile alacrity, could take the test oath. It forbade equality in the trial; for only the Government could tender the test oath. The defendant has no such right. He is at a disadvantage which is vital. A few authentic facts will answer the statement often made, that those disabled by service in the rebellion have grown old and a new generation have appeared for jury service, and that the test is a practical nullity and never executed. Take Louisiana. A citizen of twenty-seven years of age is called as a juror. He is challenged, and finally set aside, because when nine years of age he gave a contribution of $1.50 for a needy confederate soldier. Again, a case was sent for trial from Natchitoches to New Orleans, and the jury winnowed by the test to suit the "Government." It was such experience that led the Louisiana Judge Billings to inform the Attorney-General that unless the test was repealed justice was impossible, as the oath excluded from the jury-box the best citizens, the tax-payers and property-holders, and that it forced ignorance and barbarism into the box. In Caddo, Louisiana, a revengeful politician prosecuted some seventy-five persons for a conspiracy against one J. Madison Wells, of peculiar fame. Wells ran for Congress. There was a pretext as to the number of ballot-boxes used to arrest these seventy-five men; but a jury of eight colored men and four superserviceable whites was arrayed under the test; and this jury refused to discharge some of the accused, although instructed by a republican judge that there was no case. So long as that test oath remains malevolence will gratify its bitterness and justice will be a farce.

This system forbade fair trial. It placed the liberty and property and even the lives of the people in the hands of political opponents. When it is added that these partisans were summoned, paid, biased, and inspired by those who were above the ballot and selected for their offices by the Federal central power here, and that many of them were men of crass ignorance and no character, it will be at once observed how closely a fair jury trial connects itself with a free election.

QUALIFICATIONS OF JURORS.

Of course there are certain qualifications of jurors which are not affected by test-oaths in our States and in other countries beside our own. In Indiana every reputable male householder is competent to serve on a jury. In Ohio every good and judicious person having the qualifications of an elector is admissible. In Illinois every white male, if a taxable inhabitant, is qualified. In Pennsylvania the juror must be a taxable citizen of his county, sober, intelligent, and judicious.

MODES OF IMPANELING.

There are different modes of drawing the jury in different States. In Ohio and Iowa they are selected by inspectors of elections, returned by county officers, and drawn from a box. So, too, certain classes are exempt from serving. The usages of the several States differ in this respect. Clergymen, priests, physicians, attorneys, public officers, fire commissioners, keepers of bridges and toll-gates, cashiers of banks, and others, are exempt, though qualified. They must claim their exemption before they are discharged from duty.

What we desire for the Federal courts is a fair drawing from a list made up without discrimination as to party or personal ends. There is a law pending to effect this, by giving a non-partisan commission the power to select the number and names to be drawn from. No clerk of the Federal court, marshal, or district attorney should know in advance what the panel is to be. Blackstone urges that the returning officers should be indifferent, beyond suspicion. It is not alone in the South that juries have been packed for a corrupt purpose in the Federal courts. The new order of things since the war and the many new questions growing out of frauds on the revenue and under the election laws—questions of a Federal nature—make the Federal courts most important to the people of the whole State and district. And the jury of the vicinage should not be limited to an area less than the body of the district. Like the Gothic jury or nembda, it should be collected from every quarter. In the South, "confederates" who were democrats were rejected under the test oath, while "confederates" who became republicans were not challenged. There was worse than this in Chicago, where parties about to be indicted in the Federal courts were permitted to name some of the grand jury.

UNBIASED JURORS.

One of the prime rules as to the jury in all enlightened countries is, that a person interested in a case is disqualified. Persons who have expressed an opinion on the issue are in many States disqualified. The general rule for a juror is impartiality, integrity, character, judgment, and information. It is a ground of challenge, if the juror who is summoned is either prejudiced or partial, or that he lacks competent knowledge. This is to be determined by the judge or triors, before the jury is impaneled.

What, then, shall be said of a rule or law which disallows men of intelligence, character, and judgment, by an insidious mode of selection, and by a test oath; while the men who are partial and prejudiced by reason of party affiliations or by the selection of partisan clerks, marshals, and judges, are sworn to try those who opposed them, for political offenses connected with exciting elections? Candidates who seek places, officers who seek to hold them, become fierce and vindictive, even under color of law, and exhibit a rancorous ferocity toward the political foe not shown toward the blackest criminal. They use spies and informers, to instigate political prosecutions, who sell their souls by oaths and make barter in innocent blood. From such, in choosing or acting as jurors, let our repealing statute deliver us! It is the old story over again recorded in the history of the atrocious judges and their underlings.

PACKED JURIES AND SUPPLE JUDGES.

In this discussion it is proper to go to the experience recorded for our instruction. I am no laudator temporis acti; but it is as profitable to draw lessons from past misconduct as it is to reconcile that which is old and good with that which is new and wise. By observing the history of jury trials we will be certain not to oppose the progressive principles of political development; certainly we will not retrograde into the illiberalities (now removed) which obtained in our mother country more than one hundred and seventy years ago.

Let me illustrate. There was a trial in London of certain rioters in 1682. At the previous election the attempt was made to elect by undue means and illegal force two candidates for sheriff, who had a small minority of electors in their behalf. The motive was to get control of the jurors, who were picked out by the sheriffs, so as to try the friends of liberty with packed juries. The House will observe the similarity with our own condition. Violence was used in favor of the minority or court candidates. The obsequious lord mayor went to the polls to turn the tide in favor of the court candidates; he undertook illegally to adjourn the election to avoid the inevitable result. The polling of the vote was continued, however, by the popular officers, and the liberal candidates were elected. The court commanded their own minority candidates to be sworn in as sheriffs, and those who continued the election were prosecuted for a riot. Then came the atrocity. The jury was summoned by the new sheriffs. The trial came on at Guildhall before the venal Lord Chief-Justice Saunders. The defense challenged the array, because the sheriffs who returned the jury were not lawful sheriffs and had an interest. The report of the trial reveals the struggle between the courageous counsel and the obsequious judges. The counsel required a new jury according to the law. "No," said the court, "the sheriffs are sheriffs de facto." Exceptions were refused, the jury were sworn, and, amid the hum and interruptions of the people, the court directed a verdict of guilty. The carefully packed jury acquiesced. But the revolution of 1688 which followed reversed this judgment by a special act of the Legislature. English history is full of the attempts through the judiciary to wrench from the people their right to be fairly tried by their peers fixed in the great Charter.

The case of Lord Russell and Algernon Sydney, who were beheaded; of Elizabeth Gaunt, who was burned alive; of the old and loyal lady of seventy, Alice Lisle, who was hung; of Prynne, the parliamentary hero, who had his ears cut off; of Bunyan, who was imprisoned fourteen years, and of Richard Baxter, who was whipped, are to the point. Some of these cases will be specially referred to; but all, and hundreds of others, illustrate the atrocious and ferocious abuse of jury trial by such judges as Jeffreys, Wright, and Scroggs.

Perhaps the meanest acts ever committed among mankind have been by the perversion of this system, under the ermine. In so far as the jury was packed, brow-beaten, or punished, so were the franchises of Englishmen degraded and despoiled. In all history, nothing equals the conduct of the infamous Jeffreys in the reign of James II after the Duke of Monmouth's insurrection. Jeffreys went upon the circuit to hold his "bloody assizes." Three hundred and fifty-one "so-called" rebels were convicted and executed. It was done by packing, suborning, cajoling and bullying the jury. The verdict in old Lady Lisle's case is the horror of history. It makes the sanguinary climax to the woes inflicted on the innocent by the inhuman wretch and his timid and corrupt jury. This was a case of giving aid and comfort to a dissenter and a rebel, and being political has become historic.

The case of Sydney left its impress on America. He was in one sense the genius of our Revolution. His conviction was based on the doctrine, that to write was to act. His abstract speculations on government, never before published, were thrust before a corrupt jury to convict him of high treason. It was done with the aid of a truckling jury, selected by the judicial partisans of the King. Well might Sydney exclaim after the mockery of his trial and after the infamous chief-justice had sentenced him to the block: "O God! O God! I beseech Thee to sanctify these sufferings unto me, and impute not my blood to the country. Let no inquisition be made for it; but, if any, and the shedding of blood of the innocent must be avenged, I pray let it fall only upon those who persecute me for righteousness' sake." While the judges and jurors were making merry over their festivities, the purest patriot that ever stood upon our footstool passed from earth to heaven; but the inquisition for blood never ceased until the hated instrument of his death died in the Tower, a drunken monster, and the enemies of fair trial were expelled from the English realm.

Most of the reforms which the jury system have received came out of its abuses. Most of these abuses were connected with political and religious controversy. In this, history but repeats itself. Political oaths, and especially test oaths as to past conduct, thus became the odium of history and the scandal of civilization. English annals are full of instruction to us as to their baleful effects.

THE HISTORY OF JURY TRIAL.

I need not dwell upon the importance of trial by jury. It is a trial "by the country." It was said by Lord Brougham, that he was guilty of no error, he was chargeable with no exaggeration, he was betrayed by no metaphor, when he said that all we see about us, the whole machinery of state, all the apparatus of the instrument and its varied workings, ended in simply bringing twelve good men into a box. If this be true, the jury is an extraordinary element of social order. It is of that transcendent importance by which Lord Holt characterized the ballot. Any rider upon any bill which would restore or vindicate it would be justified.

Is there anything more lamentable and detestable than that which would hinder or destroy it? It is for this reason that our Constitution, in the third, fifth, sixth, and seventh articles, gives it organic sanction, both for civil and criminal cases. It has been a staunch bulwark of liberty and has added new splendors to our system of jurisprudence.

CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION—MILLIGAN CASE.

The Supreme Court of the United States (ex parte Milligan, Wallace, volume 4, page 2) not only vindicated habeas corpus and nullified military commissions, but gave emphasis and vigor to these jury guarantees of the Constitution. No matter whether in peace or war, no matter whether applied to rulers or ruled, Chief-Justice Chase and Mr. Justice Davis, standing upon the history of the jury through its English and American ordeals, set the "so-called" sympathizing, disloyal Indiana "son of liberty" free. [Laughter.] On what ground? Because the inestimable right of jury trial was violated by the rude, barbaric home-guard of Indiana. Especially did Judge Davis, lifting aloft the scales of justice, denounce the anti-social rule of a soldiery who had not even military education and habits to excuse them, for attempting to regulate by their summary tyranny the doings of a free people. At one dash of his judicial pen he annihilated the martial worship which the political flunkies of that day were glorifying. He would allow no dragooning under any pretenses, where the civil law existed and the courts were open. Here are a few of his ringing sentences:

This privilege is a vital principle, underlying the whole administration of criminal justice; it is not held by sufferance, and cannot be frittered away on any plea of State or political necessity. When peace prevails and the authority of the Government is undisputed, there is no difficulty of preserving the safeguards of liberty; for the ordinary modes of trial are never neglected, and no one wishes it otherwise. But if society is disturbed by civil commotion, if the passions of men are aroused and the restraints of law weakened, if not disregarded, these safeguards need and should receive the watchful care of those intrusted with the guardianship of the Constitution and laws. In no other way can we transmit to posterity unimpaired the blessings of liberty, consecrated by the sacrifices of the Revolution.

This decision is as truthful as it is instructive. It shows us the lofty niche which justice holds in our temple. Military commissions organized to convict, as in Milligan's case, fell before the forensic power exhibited in that case by David Dudley Field, Montgomery Blair, and Jeremiah Black. They were aided by another gentleman, who had himself been a soldier and who was then and is now a member of this House. Drawing from the arsenal of English jurisprudence; remembering the attempts of General Gage in Boston and Lord Dunmore in Virginia to overthrow the civil with martial rule; recalling the fact that the descendants of cavalier and roundhead joined with a common indignation to defeat the attempt, this eloquent commoner and distinguished soldier plead against arraignment without jury. He held that no man should be sentenced by the record of the king without his legal trial per pares. Warming with his theme, drawing his examples from the atrocities in Ireland, in our own and other lands; fortifying his argument by authority from Mackintosh, Sir Mathew Hale, and others, he reached his splendid climax—in what? Why, in the magnificent judicial courage of the judges in the seceded States during the rebellion! Let me quote:

So completely have they been impressed on the minds of American lawyers, so thoroughly ingrained into the fiber of American character, that notwithstanding the citizens of eleven States went off into rebellion, broke their oaths of allegiance to the Constitution, and levied war against their country, yet with all their crimes upon them there was still in the minds of those men, during all the struggle, so deep an impression on this great subject, that even during their rebellion the courts of the Southern States adjudicated causes like the one now before you in favor of the civil law, and against courts-martial established under military authority for the trial of citizens. In Texas, Mississippi, Virginia, and other insurgent States, by the order of the rebel president, the writ of habeas corpus was suspended, martial law was declared, and provost-marshals were appointed to administer military authority. But when civilians arrested by military authority petitioned for release by writ of habeas corpus, in every case save one the writ was granted, and it was decided that there could be no suspension of the writ or declaration of martial law by the executive or by any other than the supreme legislative authority.

When that gentleman, at the beginning of this debate, charged that the repealing statutes on the appropriation bills were "nothing less than the total subversion and stoppage of this Government;" when he found our methods of repeal "revolutionary to the core and destructive of the fundamental elements of American liberty;" when he charged that those methods would produce an army of twenty-five thousand skeletons through starvation, did he reflect that these methods were the dernier resort, to vindicate civil law against martial practices? When he paid his compliment to the rebels, who "were heroic enough to withdraw from their seats and fling down the gage of mortal battle," a proceeding so "striking and dramatic,"—in order to make the antithesis that their return is signaled by the unheroic act of tearing out certain military laws from the statute-book which impair and destroy civil supremacy,—did he forget his splendid championship of the judicial order and procedure against the discipline of the camps and the swagger of the sword-knot and epaulet? Had he forgotten the historic precedent cited from France on the expulsion of the great Napoleon, when even the incoming Bourbon acquiesced in the chartered right that "no person could be withdrawn from his natural judges?"

THE JURY AS AN EDUCATOR.

With that incident in his own country in his mind, and from his observations in this country, De Tocqueville might well consider the jury as the great educator of the whole people, especially in citizenship. It was the explicit evidence and sequence of the sovereignty and freedom of the people, as much so as suffrage itself. This French philosopher held that these two instruments of equal power—jury and ballot—were directly attributable to the supremacy of the majority. Despotic sovereigns alone sought to destroy their utility and fairness. Did not the English Tudors begin the system of attaint, fining, and imprisoning of jurors for giving false verdicts? It was well that aftertimes corrected this wrong. It was decided in the time of Charles II to be against custom and liberty. New trial took its place, and thus this great wrong was remedied. Thus fair jury trial survived all the changes of English dynasties. It preserved the liberties of England; it taught the nation the relations of right and wrong, of meum et tuum; it inspired its citizens with a love of independence. Out of the education, moral and mental, thus attained, grew the honest principle that a man who judged his neighbor should judge him, as he himself would be judged. It gave men manly confidence; it made every juror a magistrate and every citizen a sovereign within the province of his duty. While it destroyed egotism, it made every man proud to fill the part which he was bound to discharge in society. Like the ballot, it gave control over human life and all its temporal affairs. It not only taught the citizen to compare evidence and do equity, but it exercised his highest reasoning powers; it was a school for citizenship, a special system of instruction. He who would desecrate its sanctity or destroy its vigor knows little of history and cares less for the romantic and heroic genius of liberty.

ORIGIN AND FAIRNESS OF JURY TRIAL.

It matters not whence it came,—whether from the homagers of the French feudal system,—whether from Woden and his savage Scythian companions,—whether out of "the hundreds" of early English days, whether out of the forests of Scandinavia or Germany, or whether it was brought by the Romans to England in the form of selecti judices,—or by the Normans to England. Nor does it matter so much that its form and constitution were changed from mere witnesses of the fact, from the vicinage, to judges. After many haps and mishaps, it received something more than traditional welcome as unwritten law. In the reign of George IV, it was enacted that the county should be the vicinage, and that the juror need only be a good and lawful man of the county. In our States, similar enactments have been made and lawful precautions taken, so that none but good and lawful men should be selected for so high a trust. That policy should prevail, as it used to, in the Federal courts. When Sir Nicholas Throckmorton was tried in 1554, for high treason, he described what a good juror should be. "I desire," said he, "to be tried by just and honest men, that fear God more than man." We want no test oaths to keep off intelligence or honesty from the jury; we want no statute whereby ignorance shall try the lives and liberties of our people; we want honest purpose along with common sense, so that the jury shall be a safeguard against a foolish, technical, corrupt, or prejudiced court or party.

English history is full of illustrations of the mockery of partial and prejudiced juries. The very abuses of the system led to the enactment in the time of George IV. When Throckmorton was tried, the chief-justice of England, a creature of royalty and anxious to convict, threatened the jury: "I admonish you," said the frowning judge, "to take good heed what you do!" They disregarded his extra-judicial threat, and returned a verdict of "not guilty;" whereupon they were each fined £500, because of the verdict, and committed to prison. That trial was the opprobrium of that early age, and continued as an example to deter, until the revolution of 1688, when the jury system was established in its best estate, and more honored than the government or the king.

WILLIAM PENN AND HIS HEROIC JURY.

Most notable is the case of William Penn. He was indicted at the Old Bailey, in 1670, for tumultuously assembling, with others, in Grace Church street in London, where he had preached his Quaker doctrine. But the light which shone within him the unjust judge could not quench. When an honest jury were impaneled, and while he was buffeted by Jeffreys, that inner light broadened into a radiance which filled two worlds with its glory. The popinjay courtiers and bad judges of that day mistook their man—this quiet, serene, non-swearing and non-resistant Quaker; ay, too, they mistook their jury. While in former trials there had been a conspicuous failure of the system, yet, like the failure of the alchemists, it may be attributed to impurity of the ingredients; but on this trial the unalloyed gold appeared in the alembic. The personal heroism of Penn inspired the jury, and after a struggle of five days, between judges, jurors and accused, at last a verdict came in, that Penn was "not guilty." It was a scene for an historic picture. It illustrates one of the noblest sentiments of our Declaration of Independence. With it, Pennsylvania might well adorn her hall of Independence. Pennsylvania is now discussing whose effigy, chiseled by the sculptor's art, shall be sent in her behalf, to ornament our Federal Capitol. How can she hesitate? Let it be William Penn,—not as her proprietor and founder; not as standing among the red men at Shakamaxon, forging that "covenant chain" which was to last while sun and moon endure; not as a swordless magistrate, law-maker, or humanitarian; not defying the lieutenant of the Tower; but as the champion of jury trial, when it was almost friendless in the British islands.

Go with me in fancy to the London of two hundred and nine years ago. How it looked then, you may see by the rude cuts in a little volume of 1681, now on my desk. Here are the gates, the churches, colleges, gardens, and monuments! Here is Westminster Abbey and the Parliament House, White Hall and The Temple, and here the wonderful arms of the fifty trades and companies out of which the lord mayor is chosen! And here, mirabile visu! is the lord mayor himself and, tier above tier, his court of adipose aldermen! Seated at the top, between two heralds, one with a staff and another with a sword, is the grand mayor, and above him the arms of England, with a sword and a pennon inscribed Dieu et mon droit. In their full wigs, ample gowns, and "full, round bellies, with good fat capon lined," sit the pompous, puffy aldermen! These are the judges of the heroic Quaker.

This book describes the city then as so brave, fair, and stately as to "outvie the most magnificent city of the universe." Ah! it had been a proud city; and in other days displayed its pride against the craft of kings and courtiers who sought to rob it of its charter. Now, it is low indeed, under servile vassalage to a frivolous monarch, as the scene of Penn's trial shows!

Parliament had just passed the conventicle act against profane and loose persons who preached non-conformity. One of these was the well-born Quaker of twenty-five years, who had already suffered for his faith by expulsion from Oxford. He is seized by constables, while speaking to a crowd near his chapel, whose doors had been purposely closed. He is borne off to Newgate and there imprisoned.

The gray and gloomy prison had received many a miscreant and many a patriot. Here had been immured Lord Russell and Jack Sheppard, the regicide Harrison and the assassin Bellingham. It was no respecter of rank or person. Never before had its gloomy walls confined a finer or firmer spirit than that of Penn. His undaunted soul knew no prison walls.

The trial begins on the 1st of September, 1670, at the Old Bailey, "which runneth doune by the Mall, upon Hound's Ditch to Ludgate," and was equally celebrated then as now for its criminal sessions. The hero of that trial, next to Penn, is one Edward Bushel, a juror; its shame is the furious mayor, Sir Samuel Starling, and one John Howel, the insolent recorder. The aldermen and sheriffs are rather lay figures in the scene. The court is crowded. Silence is called. The witnesses are heard as to the assembling in the streets. Penn rises to acknowledge the facts and vindicate his right to meet incessantly to reverence and adore his God. "You are not here," said a bluff sheriff, "for worshiping God, but for breaking the law!" Penn asks, "What law?" "The common law," said the recorder. After much colloquy, with insolence on one side and meekness on the other, Penn is ordered away to the dungeon. Before he is dragged out, he appeals to the jury and pleads for the fundamental law of England. Of no avail. He is hurried to the bale dock, protesting against the jury being charged in his absence. Of no avail. The jury at first return an evasive verdict, that he had preached,—no more. "We will have a verdict by the grace of God, or you will starve for it," says the recorder. Again the jury is sent out.

When the mockery of the trial is over and the jury seem firm for acquittal, abuse and threats are rained upon them and their leader. "I will set a mark upon you" is the threat of the mayor to Bushel, one of the jurors. He even threatens him with personal mutilation. Penn interposes with quiet dignity: "What hope," cries out Penn, "in having justice done when jurors are threatened and their verdicts rejected?" He denounces, in the name of Magna Charta, the arbitrary conduct of the judges. "Stop his mouth," cries the mayor; "jailer, bring fetters!" "I matter not your fetters," replies the self-complacent Quaker. Again the jury are sent out, and again they return a verdict of "not guilty."

Then a dramatic scene ensues, which is faithfully transcribed:

RECORDER. Gentlemen of the jury, I am sorry you have followed your own judgments rather than the good advice which was given you. God keep my life out of your hands! But for this the court fines you forty marks a man, an imprisonment till paid.

W. PENN. I demand my liberty, being freed by the jury.

MAYOR. No. You are in for your fines.

W. PENN. Fines for what?

MAYOR. For contempt of court.

W. PENN. I ask if it be according to the fundamental laws of England that any Englishman should be fined or amerced but by the judgment of his peers or jury, since it expressly contradicts the fourteenth and twenty-ninth chapters of the great charter of England, which says, "No freeman shall be amerced but by the oath of good and lawful men of the vicinage."

RECORDER. Take him away!

W. PENN. I can never urge the fundamental laws of England but you cry, "Take him away," but it is no wonder. God, who is just, will judge you for all these things.

The jurors and the acquitted prisoner are again sent to jail; from which the great writ rescues them.

God has judged these things. He has raised up a great Commonwealth, which bears the name of the Quaker tribune, by whom English law was saved from reproach. Macaulay has stigmatized William Penn, with more flippancy than truth, as rather a mythical than an historical person. While he admits that rival nations and hostile sects have agreed in canonizing Penn, and that England is proud of his name; while the historian likens the reverence to his name, by the great Commonwealth beyond the Atlantic, to that which the Athenians felt for Theseus and the Romans for Quirinus, and confesses that his name is a synonym for purity and philanthropy; while this most critical and hostile of historians thus indulges in encomiums, there is nothing in Penn's character, whether dealing with the red man or preaching in his conventicle amidst hostility and persecution, equal to his manly stand for the sacred right of trial by jury. We can see him standing in his broad-brimmed hat and coat of formal cut, and not unlike Sydney, with undisturbed pulse and calm demeanor, insulted and berated; but answering not again, save to challenge, in the name of English liberty, the infamous mayor, recorder, sheriffs, and aldermen of London, who sought by outraging the traditions of the realm to suppress him and his teaching. His words ring down the years like the old bell of Roland of Ghent, which Motley says rang the people to arms when liberty was in danger. When that other bell from Independence Hall tolled out the death of English tyranny, it rang to all the land and the inhabitants thereof, from its brazen throat, the wedding of liberty and independence; but it also had another voice—the voice of a great State, whose foundations were laid in justice to all, and whose > —— solemn, sweet vibrations,

> Like the voice of Christ, said: "peace."

Such servility of judges and juries, which Penn denounced and contemned, became the reproach of history; but this very reproach lifted the jury above the ordinary machinery of justice and gave it a lofty place in our jurisprudence.

ANOTHER ILLUSTRATION OF A BRAVE JURY.

There are many instances where the grand jury has interposed between the Crown and the subject. In 1681 the grand jury of London, against the efforts of the judges, refused to indict the Earl of Shaftesbury and thus saved his life. The crime was venial—factious opposition to the court. When they wrote "ignoramus" on the back of the bill—lucus a non lucendo—it was a sign that they knew all about the device; and when this dead word was read in court, it became vital with liberty; for it is said that there was a most wonderful shout, so that one would have thought the hall had cracked. A good jury, grand and petit, was needed then as a bulwark against the attacks of the government and the servility of the judges. Is it less needed now in this country, where political schemes through court and jury foment discontent?

IRISH EXAMPLES.

The history of Ireland, not less than the history of England, is the history of menaces and violence upon juries to convict, which cannot long be endured in this country without adding disgrace to reproach. The case of Viscount Stormont in early days and the cases of Emmet, O'Brien, and Young Ireland in later days furnish themes too rich and resplendent for ordinary rhetoric. The case of Stormont, executed by Strafford, lord-lieutenant, without trial, returned to plague, ay, to behead the murderer.

In the case of Emmet the monstrosity of the abuse of impartial jury trial was consummate. "For endeavoring to procure for his country the guarantees which Washington had procured for America"—this was his crime; let this be his epitaph!

Would you know how Ireland has been kept unpacified and how her eight millions of aliens remained discordant in an unhappy union?" It will be found in the infamous abuse of trial by jury. Read Hansard's Debates in 1843, and from one case—that of Daniel O'Connell—learn all. When the jury list in his case was struck, twenty-seven Catholics were excluded. There was a bare chance for two Catholics out of forty-eight, but it was not realized. Lord Macaulay, in a speech at that time, charged this to a scandalous intrigue—to a violation of law and a wrong to Mr. O'Connell. Even one of the judges said that this wrong was a designed subversion of justice and that no government should avail itself of a conviction thus obtained. Here was a trial which, though against one person, was really between two religions and races, and only Protestants to give the verdict. On the principle of the jury de medietate linguae where a foreigner is tried by a jury, one-half of his nation is called to the panel; but the orator, lawyer, patriot, and statesman of Ireland had not even the poor privilege of the alien, which England when it suits her makes of every Irishman. Surely such mockeries neither tend to quietude nor justice. England has found it so in her dealings with that discontented isle. They weary earth and provoke heaven.

TEST OATHS.

Surely to protect an institution like this against abuse, any mode of legislation, by riders, withholding supplies, or otherwise, which we choose to adopt in this House, is justifiable before a people who prize their privileges. It matters not how small or great may be the obstruction to jury trial or in what form it appears. It is only a difference in degree in the persecution. The argument for these test oaths would lead to whipping at the cart's tail, to the screwing of thumbs, to the disemboweling and quartering of the dead or burning of the live body. It matters not that the test oath is one that belongs to the years of the rebellion; it becomes no less a torture and an outrage. Why should it not be discarded with the rubbish of the dead past? The fires of our civil conflict have long since died out; they would be ashes without an ember but for the party of malevolence which would grasp power by reluming the flame. The men who would impair the benefits or dusk the splendor of this system are the enemy of the people; they belong not to the party of enlightened advancement; they sink below even the semi-enlightened days of the Tudors or the Stuarts; they belong fitly to an age of barbarism, before civism became the trusted associate of liberty and justice.

Our long "iron-clad" test oath was repealed by an act of April 20, 1871. It was never re-enacted, except in the Revised Statutes, and then by fraud and indirection. The act of June 22, 1874, was, however, intended to make this and all the other revised acts the law of the land. So it remains, although some of the courts dislike to so regard it. Let it be repealed, with a warning. There is no disqualification so obnoxious and harmful. Let it be torn down, as one of the clumsy and rotten buttresses of arbitrary power!

A SWEEPING MEASURE OF REPEAL.

On last Monday week I introduced a bill to eradicate the whole system, not merely in its application to juries, but to all offices, including that of Congressmen. Here is the bill:

A bill to repeal the act of July 2, 1862, and such sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States as perpetuate the oath prescribed in said act.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," and so much of the provisions of section 1756 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and all other sections thereof, which provide for the enforcement of the provisions of said act of July 2, 1862, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and that no person hereafter shall be required to take the oath therein prescribed as a condition-precedent to the holding of any office or to serving as a juror, or to the acquirement of any right under the laws of the United States.

FORMER LEGISLATION.

In a speech which I made on February 1, 1871, on "Familiar and Frequent Oath-Taking," I have already discussed the general question. Its subject was suggested by its motto from Jeremy Bentham: "The oath implies neither faith given nor faith received. Why, then, require it? Why take it? Why this farce? Judges and legislators amuse themselves with destroying it."

The bill then pending was that which prescribed an oath to be taken by persons who participated in the rebellion and were disqualified from holding office by the fourteenth amendment. That bill was a republican measure. It was a partial measure, intended to melt down somewhat the iron-clad oath. That bill relieved the rebels only, whose disabilities had been removed by Congress, of the iron-clad oath, while for those who were innocent entirely of the rebellion, strange to say, that iron-clad oath remains to this day.

ABSURDITIES OF THE TEST OATHS—LOYAL AND DISLOYAL.

You may look over all the absurdities of mankind from the fall of Adam and you will not encounter such a comedy of errors as our system of oaths. The gallant gentleman from Virginia, General JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON, and others who participated with him in the rebellion are only required to take the oath to the Constitution, while the gallant band of Union soldiers, led by the gentlemen from Ohio, General GARFIELD and General KEIFER, and others, must file down in platoons to the area, and take the oath a yard long, swearing so help them God that they never, never, NEVER, did bear arms against the United States, and have given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement, and all that farrago as to past conduct, which is the ridiculous feature of all such political oaths. Let me place them side by side:

Good oath of bad rebel who did not support, &c., the Government.

I do solemnly swear that I will support, protect, and defend the Constitution and Government of the United States against all enemies, whether domestic or foreign, and that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or evasion; and that I will faithfully perform all the duties which may be required of me by law: So help me God.

Constitutional oath, as it ought to be.

I swear to support the Constitution of the United States: So help me God.—Article VI, section 3.

Bad oath of good patriot who did support, &c., the Government.

I do solemnly swear that I have never voluntarily borne arms against the United States since I have been a citizen thereof; that I have voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that I have neither sought, nor accepted, nor attempted to exercise the functions of any office whatever under any authority, or pretended authority, in hostility to the United States; that I have not yielded a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution within the United States, hostile or inimical thereto.

And I do further swear that to the best of my knowledge and ability I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: So help me God.

Yet these two classes of men, after being thus diversely sworn, are equals, and sit side by side in this Chamber. If Jove laughs at lovers' oaths, what a thundering peal, like the neighing of all Tattersall's, must disturb Olympus, when we loyal men, "so called," march into that area, to find the invocation to God, as to congressional duty, an implied reproach, while those who actually did the thing, serenely smile at their superior privileges and immunities. [Laughter.]

By some misadventure my name was used as an attorney for a pension claim. By some routine in that office a circular was sent to me, under section 3478, Revised Statutes:

Any person prosecuting claims, either as attorney or on his own account, before any of the Departments or bureaus of the United States, shall be required to take the oath of allegiance, and to support the Constitution of the United States, as required of persons in the civil service.

Along with this circular was this direction: "The first oath [iron-clad] is required of all persons, excepting those only who participated in the late rebellion, who may take the second [short] oath." Besides, another oath was required, as to the ability to take the long iron-clad, and so I must take the short modification. Could asininity show longer ears or flap them and bray with more pronounced resonance? Yet such laws are unrepealed, and clerks in Departments chuckle down in their diaphragms while sending such circulars to Congressmen who simply correspond with the Departments for their constituents.

POLITICAL OATHS.

What a mockery are these war oaths is shown by the history of oaths through all time. The history of political oaths is the history of oath-breaking. They were as cheap as those of dicers or of the custom-houses. There is no end to the subterfuges in swearing. As the Spanish proverb has it: "He who made the law made also its evasion." Robert, King of France, saw men forsworn upon the relics of the saints in their wagers at law. Being of a religious turn, he caused an empty reliquary of crystal to be used to lessen the guilt of perjury! Wherever there are changes of political sovereignty, wherever men have to swear one day to one ruler and the next day to another—what sort of sanctity can belong to such adjurations? There ought to be empty reliquaries for such oaths. It is a white rose to-day, a red to-morrow. It is the king, the assembly, the consulate, the monarchy, the republic, the empire, and the republic again.

Talleyrand swore thirteen times to his allegiance, from Clement XIII, on taking priests' orders, down through a century of revolutions, ending with Louis Philippe, who was crowned in 1830!

The advancement of intellect and the progress of opinion make sworn declarations of political faith and loyalty a shame and scandal, if not a joke. Bentham called those who required them corruptors of their country. Did not the Saviour reprove these convenient consciences which are solaced by such makeshifts? "Woe unto you, ye blind guides who say, 'Whosoever shall swear by the temple it is nothing; but whosoever shall swear by the gift of the temple, he is a debtor.'"

Too much oath-taking is demoralization; it is barbarism, and should be decreased, if not abolished; especially all political, whether promissory or retrospective, oaths. An oath which would turn intelligent men out of the jury-box because of past conduct, strikes at what some one in debate called the very nerve-centers of society. "How long, O Lord, how long!" shall these despicable hates remain to engender fraternal strife? How long shall they remain? When will our people be tried by a fair jury of honest men, irrespective of their political faith and devotion in former years. Why should they be compelled before taking their seats in the jury-box to recount the history of their lives, their earlier emotions, their secret thoughts and affections—written, it may be, in blood—under solemn convictions of duty?

RELIGIO-POLITICAL OATHS—BAXTER'S CASE.

There was a bitter contest in England after the revolution of 1640; it turned upon an oath. It was not merely prelacy, or the wearing of the surplice, or the use of a liturgy, or the Book of Common Prayer, or the sign of the cross which tried the soul of Richard Baxter and others like him, who would not conform to the established church. It was the et cetera oath. It had a clause from which it is named: "Nor will I ever give my consent to alter the government of the church by archbishops, bishops, deans, and archdeacons, &c., as it stands now established and ought to stand." This was an oath promissory; an oath binding fallible men never to change opinions. It included in it an et cetera—no one knew what. An adjuration thus indefinite was like our iron-clad, so indefinite as to be the essence of folly and despotism. [Applause.] Instead of helping the prelacy to be unchangeable, it roused up the Baxters of that day to resist; it became an advantage to the cause of dissent. The Long Parliament seized upon it, along with the ship-money question, to vindicate freedom and inflame the people against royalty. Puritanism thrived upon this insane proscription. It gave new truth to the French verse as to the English monarch:

Le roi d' Angleterre
Est le roi d' enfer.

Pym, Fiennes, Digby, and others of the Puritan heroes of Parliament thundered against it. It was a part of the incitement which gave to the commonwealth its synod in spiritual and its Parliament for temporal matters.

After the restoration other oaths were enacted. Those in the service of the church were required to promise subjection to the canons and abjure the solemn league and covenant. They were required to abjure the taking up of arms against the King and his officers. By this the English Church lost two thousand of its best ministers. Still another law was passed requiring of ministers an oath which, if they refused, they should not come within five miles of any city or corporation, or any place where they had lived or which sent burgesses to Parliament. This is the oath:

I, A B, do swear that it is not lawful, upon any pretense whatsoever, to take arms against the King; and that I do abhor that traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him, in pursuance of such commission; and that I will not, at any time, endeavor any alteration of the government, either in church or state.

Some took this oath, for they had no subsistence for their families among the strange country places to which they were expelled. "No severity," says Hallam, "comparable to this cold-blooded persecution had been inflicted by the late powers even in the ferment and fury of a civil war." All sorts of subterfuges and reservations were resorted to, to take the oath and not feel it binding in a certain sense. It was the fruitful source of prevarication and perjury.

In the persecutions under this oath, and while Sydney and others were falling under the ax of the despot, Richard Baxter, the leader of non-conformity, fell under the tender mercy of Jeffreys at Westminster. This judicial fiend was well selected to execute such laws, for never in the career of infamous judges is there anything to compare with his brutal treatment of this meek and just man. "Does your lordship think any jury will pass a verdict upon me upon such a trial?" asked the author of the Holy Commonwealth of this judge.

"I'll warrant you," said Jeffreys; "don't you trouble yourself about that." The packed and corrupt jury, summoned to do the bidding of the obsequious tool of a licentious court, laid their heads together and found him guilty without leaving the box.

PURITAN HEROISM.

Out of the ordeal of these odious oaths and mock trials sprang the noble army of non-conformist confessors whose labors and sufferings gave to them an immortalization on earth by the muse of history and gave to their immortality in heaven the beauty of holiness which was their "saints' rest" forever. It gave that grace and spirituality to the better part of the Puritan character, of which there is so much just boasting in our own country, and that, too, by men who have forgotten their shining example.

PRESENT PURITANISM—ITS DEGENERACY.

It is a sad, almost savage satire on those who thus vaunt of these stanch men of spiritual faith and austere manners, that their 'stalwart" descendants in the New World are the loud leaders in perpetuating the same system of proscriptive oath-taking and mock-jury trial which gave to England her revolution of 1688 and to America her earliest and bravest lovers of liberty. The lesson it teaches to New England is that—

Those who on glorious ancestors enlarge
Produce their debt, instead of their discharge. [Laughter.]

Rome in the Middle Ages had a tribune, Rienzi. He was a scholar and an antiquarian, and gave enthnsiasm to the rebellion against the licentious nobles, by displaying the relics of old Rome. Although Pope Clement gave him his friendship as God had given him eloquence, yet "freedom's withered trunk" put forth but a leaf, and these emblems of ancient greatness became only a garland for its tomb. Not all the fantastic dresses and rare relics and classic harangues could arouse the people from their lethargy. The champion of freedom, the new-born Numa, fell by the hand of the assassin; and tyranny had a new lease of riot and wrong. Let those who eulogize ancestry imitate its spirit, and not display merely the faded emblems of ancient renown.

THE OLD PURITAN HEROES.

These very test oaths, sir, drove many a Puritan, Quaker, and Catholic to the New World. It was reserved for their descendants to re-enact them here in the noon of our century, not only to affect religion and State but to inflict penalties and perpetuate hatred. Ah, where is that old Puritan spirit which led to the abolition of the star chamber, the high commission, and the Council of York, which demanded the execution of Strafford and the King, and which always held to the "petition of right" as a palladium of English liberty? Where is that spirit of parliamentary courage which arrested the attempt of the King upon the Commons when he strove to suppress Wentworth and to arrest Hampden, Pym, Hollis, Hasselrig, and Strode for high treason, because they spoke for the great charter—the petition of right and the privileges of the Commons? Where is the Puritan nerve and spirit which resisted the attempt of the King when he came to the Commons to demand the five members, with his guard of pensioners and tories, exclaiming that he would not break their privileges, but that treason had no privilege? He found his birds had flown, and retreated ignominiously from the Commons, saluted with the cry, "Privilege! privilege!" This was at a time, too, when the ax hung over the heads of outspoken Puritans.

I would not derogate from the Puritan character nor unduly exalt it. It has been said that the Puritans who came to this country had not the heroism of those who remained at home to fight for freedom against the King. It is known that many of them became more intolerant here than their persecutors had been in England. It is not for me to praise their burning of witches, their persecution of Catholics, their cutting out the tongues of Quakers, and their exile of the Baptists. Nor would it be proper to refer to their trade in slaves or their treatment of the Indians. Enough remains of the history of the Puritans of New England during the many years preceding our own Revolution to show that the spirit of Pym, Hampden, and Wentworth was instinct and alive in the Warrens, Adamses, and Hancocks of our elder day. But, alas, how have their descendants degenerated! They cannot read the history of these their own test oaths placed on our statute by them, even on "Revision," and the laws for the use of the Army to control civil affairs and override by force local rights, without a blush. They were not merely the passive instruments of their enactment and execution, but the active instruments as well.

When Macaulay describes the Puritans of old England as "looking down upon the rich and the eloquent, upon nobles and upon priests, with contempt, esteeming themselves rich in a more enduring treasure, and eloquent in a more sublime language—nobles by the right of an earlier creation, and priests by the imposition of a mightier hand"—could he have dreamed that out of a civil war in this land this domineering element, so proud and great, would fall so far as to keep on the statute tests, pains, and penalties which France, Turkey, Russia, and even Asiatic and African barbarians would be ashamed to defend?

Thus, when we follow this quasi-Puritan of this latter day, we find nothing of heroism to worship. It is like going into the old Egpytian temples; its priests are of grave aspect; its porticos and vestibules and groves beautiful; its walls resplendent with paintings, gems, silver, and amber; its adyta shaded with gold; but its god is a cat, a crocodile, or serpent, rolling upon purple coverlets. What history has not been written, what poems not sung, in praise of the heroic Puritan element, yet how ignoble their descendants seem when their proscription and bigotry are exposed.

OATHS IN GENERAL—TOO FREQUENT.

Mr. Speaker, I do not raise the question whether oaths are of divine or human origin; nor whether their use tends to the keeping of obligations and the telling of truth. Certainly it will be agreed that their frequent and careless application to judicial and political affairs is a prostitution. Is not our reverence for them and their dignity lost when they become too familiar? If we could diminish their number, would it not add solemnity to the remainder?

ENGLISH OATHS—LATE REFORMS.

Mr. Speaker, there has been great progress in dispensing with oaths in Great Britain, and in their simplification. This remark applies to ecclesiastical as well as to civil oaths. As to the former, the old oath still remains as to the doctrine, prayer, and sacraments of the established church, and against simony and stipend. This ecclesiastical law was passed in 1865. (28 and 29 Vic., page 793.) It repeals eleven statutes from Henry VIII to 1865. These statutes are a body of narrow legislation. It ought long since to have been changed or repealed.

The law of July 31, 1868, (31 and 32 Vic., 426,) shows a most enlightened progress, from which we might draw valuable lessons. Compared with our verbose, vindictive, and ridiculous "iron-clad" oath, its oath is a model of brevity and sense. It reads:

I do swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law: So help me God.

The official and judicial oaths are in the same pithy style. A schedule of the officers who are to take them is appended to the law. They are few in number. The wisdom of Parliament is also shown by the reduction of the wholesale swearing at custom-houses and elsewhere. It repeals the oath for hosts of officers and objects, and substitutes a simple declaration.

The oath to members of Parliament is fixed by the act of April 30, 1866. (29 Vic., p. 157.) It is nearly as simple as the one quoted. For a failure to take it, by a commoner, there is a fine of £500, and a further penalty "that his seat shall be vacated in the same manner as if he were dead." The schedule to this act reveals a long list of acts from Charles II to its date. These are modified or repealed. They constitute a terrible catalogue of bigotry as discreditable to England as their repeal is praiseworthy.

Some of these oaths had remained unrepealed from the time of Elizabeth. They were used in England against Catholics. The act of supremacy was amended in 1673. It was framed to exclude the Catholic; but it had a similar bearing against all dissenters. It increased the confusion and contention in the troublous era when it passed; but it fell under the keen blaze of our nineteenth century, which consumed the mass of the débris of intolerant ages. Along with it fell many politico-religious tests. The thirty-nine articles were no longer to the Jew a stumbling-block, nor to the Baptist foolishness. A new era of "reform" and "emancipation" opened in the time of George IV. It not only relieved the Catholic of disabilities, but "every person of the persuasion of the people called Quakers," besides three repeals of the disabilities of that divine and eternal race of races, the Hebrews, and a substitution of declarations in lieu of oaths! Yet with this light radiating from the English legislature, we, who vaunt so much, grope in the darkness of her earlier proscription.

An English writer insists that one-half of the oaths taken in the courts should be dispensed with, including all promissory oaths as to the performance of duty. He would increase penalties for falsehood, while he diminishes oaths.

MANNER OF SWEARING.

The manner of administering oaths has much to do with their strength or feebleness. How ridiculous was the oath of allegiance administered during our war! A cavalry company dashes from house to house, and swears the rebels in. It is followed soon by a company of rebels, who swear them out. [Laughter.] Some of our soldiers liked the swearing in at the rear more than the fighting at the front. At breakfast, dinner, and supper, over hardtack or whisky, night and day, when the swearer was in the humor, off he dashed after a disloyal victim.

One who had that line of patriotic duty in charge has given me an oath which illustrates this point:

You do solemnly swear (Look here! take that cigar out of your mouth!) that you'll bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America; that you'll serve them honestly and faithfully (Stop that damned talking in the ranks!) against all enemies and opposers whomsoever; (Johnny, bring me that demijohn!) that you'll observe and obey orders of the President of the United States, (Take off your hat, and keep your hand up!) and the orders of the officers appointed over you; so help you God. Now git! [Great laughter.]

This kind of swearing was not peculiar to the war. Dickens gives a similar mode in the English courts. The constant habit of administering the same oath naturally begets this unpunctuated and mingled monotone of indifference and frivolity. It is like Chaucer's monk, who forever repeated:

—"a few terms, two or three,
That he had learned out of some decree,
No wonder was, he heard it all the day."

One of the peculiar features of the iron-clad is that it compels a person to swear that while he is taking the oath he is not forswearing himself, i. e., that he has no mental reservations, that he is playing no sleights with his conscience, no thimblerig with words; or, in other words, he is sworn that while he is swearing he is not lying! I have here an illustration of a peculiar mode of swearing. It is an oath which reserves so many conditions and qualifications that it nullifies itself. Carlton publishes it of one of his Celtic characters. Being urged by his good priest to take a pledge against intemperance, the affiant went to the schoolmaster of his village and had the following drawn:

Oath against liquor made by me, Cornelius O'Flaherty, philomath, on behalf of Misther Peter Connell, of the Cross-Roads, merchant, on one part, and of the soul of Mrs. Ellish Connell, now in purgatory, merchantess, on the other.

I solemnly, and meritoriously, and soberly swear that a single tumbler of whisky punch shall not cross my lips during the twenty-four hours of the day, barring twelve, the locality of which is as followeth:

Imprimis—Two tumblers at home	2
Secundo—Two more ditto at my son Dan's	2
Tertio—Two more ditto behind my own garden	2
Quarto—One ditto at the Reverend Father Mulcahy's	1
Quinto—Two more ditto at Frank M'Carroll's, of Kilclay	2
Sexto—One ditto wid ould Bartle Gorman, of Cargah	1
Septimo—Two more ditto wid honest Roger M'Gaugy, of Nurchasey	2
	12

N. B.—I except in case any docthor of physic might think it right and medical to ordher me more for my health; or in case I could get Father Mulcahy to take the oath off of me for a start, at a wedding, or a christening, or at any other meeting of friends where there's drink. [Applause and laughter.]

I do not know whether Congressmen would make these extensive reservations. [Laughter.] How would it affect my colleague [Mr. CHITTENDEN] from the City of Churches. [Laughter.] He is our swearing member. [Laughter.] He could not take this oath after his orthodox apology. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen here know how recruits were sworn, and how they were prepared for the battles of the Republic. No custom-house officer ever administered a stressless oath with more haste and nonchalance than do some of our courts. Who feels their binding force? Who is not shocked by the irreverence and frivolity? When the captain of the Pinafore, in a hasty fit of temper, says "damme," the chorus of good sailors is horrified. The burlesque is equally applicable to other oaths. Such trivial and frequent swearing is no swearing at all; and by extremes, it comes near the Bible command, "Swear not at all." They remind one of the man who was swearing loudly to Hercules. His companion said: "Do not call so loud or the god may hear you." [Laughter.] Our statutes groan with oaths at every page, and, like the ghost in Hamlet, moan: "Swear!" "Swear!" They should evanish with the dawn. Governments condemn thugs, carbonari, ku-klux, nihilists, and secret societies generally, for their mystic oaths. Let government set an example and abolish the custom. The wisest writers, like Bentham, hold them repugnant to the Christian religion. He wonders why, under such a religion, oaths should be so common. The answer is not complimentary to our civilization. In earlier days society was cemented by oaths. Liberty was assured, as in Switzerland, by an oath. Patriotism, perhaps, is nerved and obligations sanctified by it, when the bonds of society become loose and require tightening. But now what a farce is this constant swearing!

BIBLICAL OATHS.

You say they are drawn from the Bible? They are not peculiar to the Good Book. True, Abraham took oaths; he lifted up his hand to do it; and on one occasion he swore in a peculiar way. God is represented as swearing unto Abraham by Himself, as He could swear by none greater. The angel in the Revelations swears by Him that liveth for ever and ever that time should be no longer. Was it not a beautiful invocation, that of Ruth? Not less so than the declaration by which Eli bound the little Samuel. All through the Old Testament, from the death-bed of Jacob to Hannah's address to Eli; from the answer of Abner to Saul to that of Elijah to Elisha, there are oaths recorded; but they do not impress us as frivolous.

There has been much metaphysical discussion as to the definition of an oath. Is it a religious affirmation or an invocation to God as a witness? Is it an imprecation for the vengeance of God upon him who swears falsely, or a mere promise? This discussion may be settled by the Old and New Testaments. What was the custom and law of the Jews? The Greek word often used in the latter interprets one meaning of the oath, ἐξορκίζω—"I adjure thee," "I call on thee to declare on oath." All the versions of the Scripture and the writings of Josephus and the Greek classics confirm this view. The corresponding Hebrew word is שבע, and signifies at all times and places in the Jewish history an adjuration. From Genesis to Revelations it is the same, and its sacred and majestic adjuration, used by the high priest to evoke the truth, is not lessened by too much frequency and by no frivolity in its administration.

The new dispensation discloses another custom: "Let your communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." Many sects besides the Anabaptists, Moravians, and Quakers hold that the oath is an abuse of the name of God. Calvin said that there was no need of such a superfluity of oaths, and therein he followed the Christian fathers. Augustine sums his creed up in these words: "False swearing is fatal, true swearing is dangerous, swearing not at all is safe;" while Chrysostom, of the golden mouth, said that "swearing took its beginning from want of truth and punctuality."

CLASSIC AND OTHER OATHS.

Classic literature is full of oath-taking. Homer's heroes, like the army in Flanders, swore terribly. [Laughter.] Even Helen swore fidelity to Menelaus. We know how she kept it. [Laughter.] The immortal gods swore by the waters of the Styx; but the bulk of classic swearing was done by attesting and imprecating in the name of the gods. Sometimes the Romans swore by their swords and their Cæsars. Numa swore by the goddess Fides, while now and then a warrior swore by the quiver of Diana. The Egyptians swore by cats, dogs, snakes, crocodiles, baboons, and onions. [Laughter.] Sometimes the soldiers of that early era killed a bull, dipped their hands in its gore, and, like other valiant men, swore to Bellona to do brave deeds. [Laughter.]

In China a saucer is broken, and they swear to be broken like it if they lie; in India they cut off the head of a rooster, with the same sort of imprecation. Sometimes they swore by holding a cow by the tail, that useful beast being sacred with the Brahmins. [Laughter.]

All through history, from Justin Martin down to George Fox, by death at the stake even, by imprisonment often, Christian martyrs and preachers suffered, because they would not swear. After the restoration in England, three thousand and sixty-eight Quakers went to jail rather than give up their non-oath-taking tenets.

But of all the oaths, the one most repugnant to good sense and conscience is that as to future conduct. When men swear, as did Harold to William of Normandy, that he would renounce the crown, and then began to rebel; when King John and his son Henry swear to Magna Charta only to break it; or Cromwell, to keep Parliament in session five months, and then breaks it; or Francis I breaks his oath after his release,—then we perceive how cheap historic oath-taking is; but what shall we say of tests in the form of oaths as to past opinions and conduct and as to countenancing and comforting a lost cause! By them you require a man either to perjure himself, or be proscribed from jury and other official duty. You make him the pariah of society.

When we consider how many cunning devices are resorted to, as by kissing the thumb instead of the Book, and how many lies are told which, as Coke says, "concern not the suit, and therefore are extrajudicial," and upon which no perjury can be assigned, may we not conclude that these make-shifts contribute to lying. Do they not belittle the importance of the oath? Are they not the effect of frequent and familiar swearing? Do they not dishonor society and government—its agent? Do they not call down religion from its heavenly home and drag it into the mire of human depravity? Therefore, do they not corrupt the very well-springs of truth and justice?

It is because, Mr. Speaker, the iron-clad oath, which is the test for jurors and others, is a portion of such a system of demoralization and barbarism, that I introduced the bill for its abolition. I will not say now that I would go further and abolish all political retrospective and promissory oaths. But no fear of revolution, no timidity about coercion, no abhorrence of riders, would for a moment deter me from following a policy which would save society from that reckless invocation of the Divine Majesty which is so carelessly used on the occasions of oath-taking. Is it not appalling that upon so many trifling occasions we call upon the sacred name of God and dim that effulgence which emanates from the promise of His word by contamination with the imperfections and vices of men?

MISSOURI TEST OATH.

I doubt, if all the oaths ever recorded in sacred or classic lore, or propounded in any land, for political, religious, judicial, martial, or festive purposes; whether for jurors, witnesses, or officials; whether at custom-houses or at marriage rites; whether to suspected patriots or supposed traitors; from Noah, who took the first oath, down to the cloud of investigation-committee witnesses, can compare for one moment with what is known as our "iron-clad oath" for the ridiculousness and variety of its application. There is one exception; and that, too, is in our country. It is to be found in the Missouri constitution made by the republicans just before the end of the war.

That oath illustrates that there are some laws and some men who defy the everlasting order and congruity of things to carry out their grudges. It is enough to damn the party which made it to an eternity of infamy. Luckily the Supreme Court of the United States cut it up by the roots. Although it remained five years to blot the organic law of a great and growing State, and although its provisions again and again were used to give a small minority of the people of Missouri the ruling power, yet at last its authors hid from public execration, and the oath was stamped out by the decision of Mr. Justice Stephen J. Field, in an opinion which adds to his fame as an enlightened and liberal-minded jurist.

The decision was made in the case of Cummings vs. the State of Missouri, 4 Wallace, page 277. The plaintiff was a Catholic priest. He was indicted and convicted of the crime of teaching and preaching the Christian religion without having first taken the oath required by the amended constitution of April, 1865. He was fined $500. Refusing to pay it, he was committed to jail; and, like St. Paul, would not come out, until by due process of the law which placed him there.

The supreme court of Missouri had the effrontery and ignorance to confirm that judgment. That oath was divided into more than thirty distinct tests. Some of the tests were never even offenses by the laws of the State, and some of them were not even blameworthy, but grew out of charity and affection. The affiant was required on oath to affirm not only that he had never been in armed hostility to the United States, but never by act or word manifested his adherence to the enemy or his desire or sympathy with those in rebellion, and had never harbored or aided or countenanced any person so engaged, and had never come into or left Missouri to avoid enrollment or draft or to escape his duty in the military service of the United States or the militia of the State, and had never indicated in any terms his disaffection.

Those who could not or did not take this "oath of loyalty," as it was called, within sixty days, were ousted from office, if in; and incapacitated from holding office, if out. They were debarred from all kinds of offices, even of corporations, public and private; they could not be supervisors, or even teachers of schools, nor hold real estate or property of any kind, in trust for any purpose. All such offices of trust became ipso facto vacant on the failure to take this many-headed, many-clawed oath. Nor could any one practice law, or be bishop, priest, deacon, elder, or other clergyman of any religious sect; neither could he teach, preach, or solemnize marriages. This oath is without precedent in history. This oath is without semblance among gods, prophets, saints, soldiers, men, women, or devils, and yet it remained five years! Besides, it required the fiat of our Supreme Court to tear it from the body-politic of Missouri.

The fourteenth section contained the penalty in which Cummings was amerced, as well as another penalty for false swearing. These were the devil-fish tentacula, grappling the people of Missouri, while toiling in the caverns of doubt and despair. In England and France the old test oaths which were so odious were limited to an opposition of the predominant government or religion. Their oath was directed against overt acts of hostility. It never reached the humiliation of punishing men for their heart-throbs and kinship.

Judge Field placed his heel upon this oath as if it were a viper. He found it not only to be in every sense a bill of attainder, but an ex post facto law. It was a law which imposed a punishment for an act not punishable at the time it was committed. He held that a deprivation of such offices and duties in life was in all senses a punishment, nor was it less a punishment because a way of escape from it was opened by an oath.

Well did those vile bigots of Missouri understand that whole classes would be unable to take the oath prescribed; and thereby become incapable of jury or any other duty to society or to the State. Hence, comforted and protected by the proscriptive bigotry and hate of Congress, with its "iron-clad," they disfranchised the majority of he State.

OATH AND IMPRISONMENT OF SISTERS OF CHARITY.

How was this law—if it were a law—executed? Certainly it was not in the ordinary sense a law. It had not the excuse of legislative inconsiderate haste. It was in the fundamental constitution of a great State. It had not even the flimsy excuse of Protestant bigotry against the Catholic faith. In some counties Methodists as well as Catholics were indicted, tried, and convicted for preaching Christ's gospel of love; because, like Richard Baxter, they would not commit perjury or conform to the oath. These men had been preaching for years; but no amount of work in the vineyard of the Lord saved them from the remorseless clutch of these self-righteous loyal Pharisees. True, this constitutional clause was not directed against the body. It did not use torture, rack, and thumb-screw. It was a radical ukase against the sacred conscience of men—a torture of the soul—a devilish plot against the ministrations of all religions and the teachings of all classes of mind. It was worse than barbaric.

In the recent wars of Europe the red-cross flag of Geneva upon the white ground of charity gave immunity to those who cared for the sick. It alleviated suffering and saved life. It earned the blessings and gratitude of all. It gave laws of kindness to war. But this infamous oath which stopped the physician in his round of duty to the sick and dying and the priest in his consolations, and that under the pressure of an oath to Almighty God, would have hauled down the red cross of Geneva. When it did not imprison the clergyman in his home, it did worse; it consigned him to the common jail. It was worse than the "five-mile act" of Episcopal bigotry against the Dissenters.

SISTERS OF CHARITY.

How was it executed? Let one instance illustrate. The radical ghouls of Cape Girardeau County, under this law, indicted the Sisters of Charity who taught in a convent. Three of these angels of mercy were dragged into court several times, indicted, and tried; and even the foreman of the grand jury sent his own child to the convent to be taught, so as to get proof of the teaching and so as to convict. They had not taken the oath. In their case, however, public opinion revolted, and the Titus Oateses of Missouri hid their heads for a time from public opinion, but not until they left for us lessons of their proscriptive meanness which, in degenerating from the days of Pym and Hampden, Baxter and De Foe, left imperishable evidence of their unfitness to live as generous co-workers for good in human society. Ah, if those Sisters of Charity and Mercy, the Florence Nightingales of our conflict, have passed from earth and found their beatitudes in the yonder azure sheen, where they walk white-handed in celestial light, singing the praises of the good Saviour they served here among men,—with what pitying eye do they look down upon the foolish and spiteful human craftiness which sought to break the blessed utility and unity of their lives by relentless persecution. Language has no vehicle of expression, the mind no idea, fit to tell the burning shame which should blister forever the cowardice and cruelty of a test so odious and hateful. [Applause.]

Sergeant Talfourd in his "Ion" exquisitely describes the solace and comfort of those who by benevolent endeavor mold their lives into benevolence:

'Tis a little thing
To give a cup of water; yet its draught
Of cool refreshment, drained by fevered lips,
May give a shock of pleasure to the frame
More exquisite than when nectarean juice
Renews the life of joy in happiest hours.
It is a little thing to speak a phrase
Of common comfort which by daily use
Has almost lost its sense; yet on the ear
Of him who thought to die unmourned 'twill fall
Like choicest music.

But these radical constitution-makers and executors of infamous statutes would arrest and imprison the Sisters of Charity who have gladdened our sad world by their merciful ministrations. The names of this sisterhood are not sounded by the brazen trumpets of publicity, nor mingled with the notes of sectarian discord; but they are found on the criminal records of radical Missouri—the disgrace of our generation. [Applause.]

What execrations are not due to those who persecuted these loving laborers. From the earliest centuries after Christ when the noble Roman lady, Paula, took up her residence in Bethlehem, to care for and comfort the sick; from the time she "laid their pillows aright," as the old chronicle tells us, and felt that the less service she did to the sick the less she did to God; from the time of this first sister of mercy down to our day, when the kind Sœurs Hospitalières of France, Béguines of Flanders, and the Sisters of Elizabeth in Germany, in their black gowns and white hoods, their complacent sweetness and holy living, gave to the stricken, their self-devotion so nobly illustrated by Florence Nightingale and her company of noble women, whose only prayer was to go where suffering and perils were greater—no one ever dared to lay secular or rude hands upon this sisterhood.

It was to have been hoped that, at the close of our civil war, when the bugles had sounded the long truce and war-broken soldiers were left stranded in the hospitals, there was no one in human shape who would be so regardless of those gentle and superior beings of the other sex—who had shown such self-abnegation—as to persecute them as outlaws of society. Had they not bent over the wounded and sick "when pain and anguish wrung the brow," and whispered low the words of peace, patience, and divine hope, while smoothing the pillow and holding the cup to the parched lip? Had they not aided the healing power with moral cheerfulness, and by their softening and purifying presence given good impulses and holy thoughts to the sick and dying? Why, even the Robespierres and Dantons and the very devils of the French Reign of Terror respected this sisterhood. They were recalled by a special decree of the republic, which recited their boundless love and charity; and their faithful head, Citoyenne Duleau, was given new authority to practice that beautiful vocation—as described in Lucille—the poetical counterpart of Florence Nightingale:

The mission of genius on earth! To uplift,
Purify, and confirm by its own gracious gift
The world, in despite of the world's dull endeavor
To degrade, and drag down, and oppose it forever.
The mission of genius: to watch, and to wait,
To renew, redeem, and to regenerate.

But had this sisterhood lived in Missouri and given their facile sympathy and good offices to the wounded rebels, fine and imprisonment would have been their punishment. The very fiends of the Reign of Terror put to shame these bigots of our day and generation! Spenser tells the story of three brothers; when one died he did not go to join Plato's grizzly band, but his spirit entered into his brother, and when that brother died the joint spirit entered into the survivor. The republicans of this Congress seem to have inherited the spirit of their brother radicals of Missouri. How long will they live?

In West Virginia the constitution forbade any one to teach school who had not taken an oath. Girls of fourteen were suppressed as teachers under this policy of spite.

IN RE GARLAND.

The Supreme Court has more than once passed on the iron-clad oath. In the case of the eminent Senator GARLAND, who desired to resume his practice in the Supreme Court of the United States, and at the same term, the same principles as in the Cummings case, were adopted. The court allowed him to resume his practice in the United States Supreme Court. By a law passed on the 24th of January, 1865, the iron-clad oath had been extended to the attorneys of the courts of the United States. But the court held that the oath prescribed operated as a legislative decree of perpetual execution and was ex post facto.

IRON-CLAD UNCONSTITUTIONAL AS TO JURORS.

In furtherance of these precedents and based on these enlightened principles, the Supreme Court of the United States, the same courageous judge (Stephen J. Field) delivering the opinion, in the case of George Burt against Maria M. Paiyaud, decided at the October term of 1878, in error to the circuit court for the northern district of Florida, that the iron-clad oath affecting the jury-box was novel, oppressive, odious and repugnant to the spirit of our free institutions, unconstitutional, and void. I copy his decision:

I agree with the court that the juror Holmes, in this case, could not be required to answer the questions put to him; but I go further. I do not think that the act of Congress which requires a test oath as to past conduct, and thereby excludes a great majority of the citizens of one-half the country from the jury-box, is valid. In my judgment the act is not only oppressive and odious and repugnant to the spirit of our institutions, but is unconstitutional and void. As a war measure, to be enforced in the insurgent States when dominated by the national forces, it could be sustained; but after the war was over, and those States were restored to their normal and constitutional relations to the Union, it was as much out of place and as inoperative as would be a law quartering a soldier in every southern man's house.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the repealing of these statutes, which cloud our representative system, is our paramount duty. No appropriation can satisfy a free people while they remain. Let us re-crown the discrowned majesty of the people. Let us re-enthrone by the repeal of these statutes the States in their proper relation to the Government, and thus reset and repolish the jewels of popular sovereignty.

HEROES OF 1861 AND THEIR CONTRAST.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in his opening speech at this session, sought to place the onus of repealing these obnoxious statutes upon the southern democracy. I beg to say that the action taken at the last and at this session was not the action of one section or of one class of democrats. The points of the compass have no bearing upon this matter. Our action binds all sections. The advice which led to it was not taken exclusively from any part of the country. The gentleman found no end to his admiration of the democratic Congressmen who seceded from this Hall in 1861. Their noble and heroic conduct was the theme of his admiration; but he more than intimated his detestation of their present conduct in seeking to obliterate these legislative anomalies, born of the war. It was so unhandsome and unheroic in contrast with their splendid heroism as rebels. Ah! the gentleman's purpose is understood. It is not so much to fix opprobrium upon the solid South as to revamp the old slander against the democracy of the North. He would admire the military heroes of 1861 to derogate from their civil courage of 1879, and by reviving the bad blood of other times, endeavor to regain for his party their lost power over roads macadamized with stale libels upon the northern democracy. I regret to say that some color to this view has been given by southern men; especially by one gentleman, who in the heat of debate said that the South learned secession from the northern democracy. I wish he had waited until my eloquent friend from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] had spoken. He fitly discriminated between the northern and southern democracy when he said:

When the war was closed and the republican party undertook to destroy the Constitution, history will say that the same gallant northern democracy, with the same flag in their hand, rallied the southern democrats and drove the republicans back to their duty. We, sir, in the South loved the Constitution more than the Union; the republican party loved the Union more than the Constitution; but it will be written in history that the gallant democracy of the North were the truest patriots of the land, and that they loved both the Union and the Constitution, one and indivisible.

This statement might go further and be equally just. Does the gentleman forget, what Mr. Greeley in his volume on the "Conflict" would inform him, that the great body of men of the South were opposed to secession? He will find the facts and votes furnished in that volume. Does he forget, too, the men of the democratic party who opposed secession and risked and lost their lives for the Union? Would he ignore the McClellans and Hancocks and men of no less note, who maintained the vigor of our Federal system against secession, and who fought for both Union and Constitution? It pleased him and others to derogate from the Northern democracy, when he arrogated unto his party all the praise of quelling the "so-called" heroic rebellion. We understand his eulogy and its subtle intent, when he praises his party and the southern democracy in 1861, in order to dispraise the democracy of the North then and the democracy of both sections now.

Does he remember that in 1860 the democratic party divided, one great portion of it, under Douglas, representing the Union-constitutional sentiment, with 1,365,976 votes, and the other, representing the southern sentiment, with 847,953 votes? Is it manly, just, and fair to ignore his democratic brothers-in-arms and those of us who voted all supplies to quell the rebellion? When the democracy were sundered, was there no patriotic principle for us North, to guide our conduct? He forgets that the northern democracy, in States like Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, favored Douglas, while the extreme States of the South only, were largely for Breckinridge. He forgets that in the three great States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio the whole democratic vote was cast for Douglas, with the exception of some 25,000 for Breckinridge.

He forgets that the southern secession leaders could muster only about one-fifth of the total votes of the United States, and that the northern democracy fought through the crisis of 1860-'61 and the remaining years of trial and blood, like men as heroic as those from whom they parted. He forgets that in Illinois 75 votes were given to Douglas to 1 for his extreme southern competitor; yet the gentleman glorifies southern heroism to detract from his northern democratic neighbors. At what particular time did the gentleman from Ohio learn to love rebellion, that he should make an apotheosis to its heroism? Ah! why? Is it because we of the North opposed extra-constitutional methods of conscription and confiscation; or is it because since the war the democracy have shown the spirit of forgiveness and favored amnesty, that all might come under the shadow of the Government? Is it because we have sought to make our southern brethren equals here, when they came back redeemed from their prostration and the oppression of your military satraps, under the reconstruction? Is it because southern men have joined with us in the back pay and pensions of Union soldiers? Is he sorry that we would build up by generous policies the waste places of the South, and lift up a highway for the people yet wandering in the mazes of test oaths, military force at elections, and supervisor espionage and oppression? Would he make a desert or an aceldema of the South?

Is it a pleasure to depreciate, denounce, and degrade the northern democracy? Does his own party need require this? Did our party fail in furnishing troops for the war? Was it a falsehood when a republican Legislature of New York gave Governor Seymour the credit for even exceeding the call for soldiers? Did they fail to pay their taxes? Did they fail in giving their youth, their manhood, their sympathy to the Union which their fathers loved and to the Constitution which Washington helped to frame? How can such statements be characterized?

GENERAL AMNESTY.

The other day when urging general amnesty upon the House, a sneering insinuation was made, that perhaps even one so humble as myself, might be reluctant to take the loyal oath, and that perhaps I would feel much more satisfaction in taking the iron-clad oath. This innuendo touches a long and anxious service here on the side of my Government before and during the war.

Sir, I never was recreant to this Government. In my relations to southern men, I have no disguise as to my attachment to the unity of our country, in all its struggles. I was almost the first to denounce here separation as fraught with every evil. I print it because I was threatened by some one with my record of loyalty. Let this prophecy from a speech in 1861 answer all calumnies:

I call this secession revolution. I will not in an American Congress, with an oath on my conscience to support the Constitution, argue the right to secede. No such right can ever be had, except by amendment of the Constitution legalizing such secession. It is a solecism to speak of the right of secession. It is revolution; and the burden of proof is on him who begins it to show why he seeks the change.

I would therefore guard against the least recognition of this right of secession or of nullification, which is the lesser type of the same disease. It would, I say, destroy all government; it would dissolve the united mass of powers now deposited in the Union into thirty-three separate and conflicting States, each with a flag, a tariff, an army, a foreign policy, a diversity of interest, and an idiosyncrasy of ideas. Nay, that would be tolerable; but it would do more and worse. It would disintegrate States, counties, towns; tear cities from their places on the map; disorder finances, taxes, revenue, tariffs, and convert this fabric, now so fair and firm that it seems built on the earth's base, pillared with the firmament, into a playhouse of cards built on a base of stubble. It would thus destroy the established order. And is such order among men, with a view to permanency, nothing? The North has rights, property, interests, relations in the South not to be sundered without loss; and the South in the North vice versa. Is this nothing? Is depreciation of property, depression of business, loss and lack of employment, withdrawal of capital, derangement of currency, increase of taxes, miscarriage of public works and enterprise, destruction of State credit, the loss of that national symmetry, geography, strength, name, honor, unity, and glory, which publicists tell us are themselves the creators and guardians of cash, credit, and commerce, are these consequences nothing?

I wish that I could contemplate secession as a peaceful remedy; but I cannot. It must be a forcible disruption. The Government is framed so compactly in all its parts that to tear away one part you tear the whole fabric asunder. It cannot be done by consent. There is no authority to give consent. The Constitution looks to no catastrophe of the kind. It is a voluntary, violent, and ex parte proceeding. A majority of the States and a great majority of the people are hostile to it. In this angry and warlike disruption of the compact, where shall we find our more perfect Union, the establishment of justice, domestic tranquillity, provision for the common defense, the promotion of the general welfare, and the security of the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity?

Yet, sir, in thus speaking I was never averse to reunion and fraternity, never during the war nor since. I remembered the Hiawatha case, and Vattel's code; with a line of force—and a blockade. Surely there was room and verge enough for some of the liberalities of politics. When I predicated the exchange of prisoners and no confiscation of the fee-simple, it was in the line of these liberalities.

Allow me to say that from the time the war closed until the present time, I have objected to individual amnesty bills, though voting for them, preferring a general bill, because based on a principle. In the Forty-fourth Congress, on my motion, such a bill passed this House by a two-thirds vote. Gentlemen seem to forget that. I have not favored this principle altogether because it would be a grace and help to the South, but because it would be a grace, an anodyne, a comfort, and a benefit to ourselves. It has been said that forgiveness to your enemy is a charming way of revenge. It leaves your foes your friends and brings about grateful retaliations. An enemy reconciled by force is not so readily to be trusted. As the Italians have it: "Sospetto licenzia fede;" suspicion dismisses faith. I would appeal to gentlemen on the other side, if they have not the spirit of kindness toward others, not to be cruel to themselves. As Sir Thomas Brown has said, "It only feathers the arrow of the enemy." It destroys all that is knightly and magnanimous. There is no lack of patriotism in following the precepts of history as to clemency. It teaches that revenge is injustice and hurts most those who indulge in it.

Fourteen years have passed since the war was closed. We have felt, those of us who are northern democrats, that a great wrong was done by this long delay in healing the wounds of the war; but we were prompt to draw the curtain upon our wrongs. Christian, Hebraic, and even pagan lessons are plentiful to teach us to regard such civil wrongs as though they had not been. Gentlemen on the other side would forgive; yet they "powder their opiate with scorn and contempt." They punish while they forgive. This is no charity. Reservation in forgiveness is a species of hatred. Let us imitate the divine forgiveness. It lies in the principle of loving and being loved: "to love Him because He first loved us." It is the doctrine of peace and good-will.

A DEMOCRATIC OATH.

Is it for us, who have our brothers near us here as our equals, to harbor the spirit of separation, distrust, and enmity? Let us, if we can, be bound and solidified by one Constitution, for one inseparable Union, and under it, for the untrammeled will and rich heritage of its past wisdom and glory. If we must have a test, let us swear to each other by each and every star upon the blue field of our ensign, by the white radiance, in which all colors—red, white, blue, ay, and gray—blend as one—not, as in the old Italian code, by the God who avenges, but as the old Anglo-Saxon kings were adjured, by the grace and mercy of His Son—that good-will and amnesty shall be the spirit and aim of our legislation. Let us swear that no check shall be placed upon the will or the tribunals of the people but for the people, and never, by the Eternal! never to yield our right, how ever and how often defeated, to grant the money and substance of the people that it may be used for their own undoing!

When our laws require of all officers, jurors, and agents of the Government, that they should take the test oath, so help them God,—what God do they invoke? On whom do they call? Is it the God of vengeance and hate, or is it the God of love and mercy? If it be the latter, then what a mockery is the oath which is the proof and perpetuation of revenge and unforgiveness? The God we would invoke for amnesty and peace has given us a code of ethics, whose highest illustration is drawn from the Sermon on the Mount. Would that I could picture to you that mountain, with its divine orator speaking those ineffable truths!

Is it possible that my friend from the Silver State could have used these words?

Prosperity sleeps benumbed in the frozen vault of fear; and the great and mighty North, with its generous and forgiving heart, stands at the door, as Jesus stood at the tomb of Lazarus, ready to resurrect and quicken it, with the inspiration of a new life.

I observe this eloquent language in the RECORD. Could a representative of our Mountain State have forgotten the teachings of the Saviour?

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

Mr. Speaker, it may be a fancy, but I sometimes think that the loftiest and purest thoughts come down to us from the mountain.

> But in the mountains we do feel our faith.
> All things responsive to the writing there
> Breathed immortality, revolving life,
> And greatness still revolving; infinite;
> There littleness was not; the least of things
> Seemed infinite.

I hope it may not be presuming to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been something of a traveler, and have been upon many mountains of our star. I would that my observations had been better utilized for duty. I have been upon the Atlas, whose giant shoulders were fabled to have upheld the globe. I have learned from there, that even to Northern Africa the Goths brought their fueros or bills of right, with their arms, from the cold forests of the North to the sunny plains and rugged mountains of that old granary of the Roman world. I have been amid the Alps, where the spirit of Tell and liberty is always tempered with mercy, and whose mountains are a monument through a thousand of years of republican generosity. I have been among the Sierras of Spain, where the patriot Riego—whose hymn is the Marseillaise of the Peninsula—was hunted after he had saved constitutional liberty and favored amnesty to all,—the noblest examplar of patriotism since the days of Brutus. From the seven hills of Rome, down through the corridors of time, comes the story which Cicero relates from Thucydides: that a brazen monument was erected by the Thebans to celebrate their victory over the Lacedæmonians, but it was regarded as a memento of civil discord, and the trophy was abolished, because it was not fitting that any record should remain of the conflict between Greek and Greek. From the same throne of ancient power, come the words which command only commemoration of foreign conquests and not of domestic calamities; and that Rome, with her imperial grace, believed that it was wisest to erect a bridge of gold, that civil insurgents should pass back to their allegiance. From the Acropolis at Athens, there is the story of the herald at the Olympic games, who announced the clemency of Rome to the conquered, who had been long subjected to the privations and calamities imposed by the conqueror. The historian says that the Greeks, when the herald announced such unexpected deliverance, wept for joy at the grace which had been bestowed.

All these are but subordinate lights around the central light, which came from the mountain whence the great sermon was spoken. Its name is unknown; its locality has no geography. All we know is that it was "set apart."

The mountains of our Scriptures are full of inspiration for our guidance. Their teachings may well be carried into our political ethics. But it was not from Ararat, which lifted its head first above the flood and received the dove with its olive branch; not from Sinai, which looks proudly upon three nations and almost three countries and overlooks our kind with its great moral code; not from Horeb, where Jehovah with His fearful hand covered His face that man might not look upon His brightness; not from Tabor, where the great transformation was enacted; not from Pisgah, where Moses made his farewell to the people he had delivered and led so long; not from Carmel, where the prayer of Elijah was answered in fire; not from Lebanon, whose cedars were the beauty of the earth; not from the Mount of Olives, which saw the agony of the Saviour; not from Calvary, at whose great tragedy nature shuddered and the heavens were covered with gloom; not from one or all of these secular and sacred mountains that our best teaching for duty comes. It comes from that nameless mountain, set apart, because from it emanated the great and benignant truths of Him who spake as never man spake. [Applause.] Here is the sublime teaching:

Ye have heard in the aforetime, that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy.

But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you.

That ye may be children of your Father which is in heaven: for He maketh His sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

The spirit of this teaching has no hospitality for test oaths, and asks no compensation for grace. [Applause.] Along with this teaching and to the same good end, are the teachings of history, patriotism, chivalry, and even economic selfishness. Yet these teachers are often blind guides to duty. They are but mole-hills compared with the lofty mountain whose spiritual grandeur brings peace, order, and civilization!

When these principles obtain in our hearts, then our legislation will conform to them. When they do obtain their hold in these halls, there will arise a brilliant day-star for America. When they do obtain recognition, we may hail a new advent of that Prince of Peace, whose other advent was chanted by the angelic choir!

In conclusion, sir, let me say that, in comparison with this celestial code, by which we should live and die, how little seem all the contests here about armies, appropriations, riders, and coercion, which so exasperate and threaten! Let our legislation be inspired by the lofty thought from that Judean mountain, and God will care for us. In our imperfections here as legislators, let us look aloft, and then "His greatness will flow around our incompleteness, and round our restlessness, His rest!" Then, measures which make for forgiveness, tranquillity, and love, like the abolition of hateful oaths and other reminders of our sad and bloody strife, will rise in supernal dignity above the party passions of the day; and that party which vindicates right against might, freedom against force, popular will against Federal power, rest against unrest, and God's goodness and mercy, around and above all, will, in that sign, conquer. [Applause.]

To those in our midst who have the spirit of violence, hate, and unforgiveness, and who delight in pains, penalties, test oaths, bayonets, and force, and who would not replace these instruments of turbulence, with love, gentleness, and forgiveness, my only curse upon such is, that God Almighty, in his abundant and infinite mercy, may forgive them, for "they know not what they do." [Long-continued applause.]

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] that the House adjourn.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 4, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the chief quartermaster of the military department of Texas of the 12th ultimo in regard to the advisability of erecting barracks and quarters at San Antonio, for the headquarters of the Department of Texas.

The communication was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Owing to what was said in the Senate the other day, the Chair is in doubt whether this communication should go to the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. As the chairman of neither of those committees is present, the communication will for the present lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALL presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Florida, in favor of an act of Congress changing and correcting the boundary-lines of the collection district of Saint Marks so as to include Tampa Bay within its limits; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Florida, in favor of the establishment of a life-saving station at Cape San Blas, Calhoun County, Florida; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (S. No. 375) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. I will merely state that I shall probably ask leave to call the bill up to-morrow for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1842) to remove the political disabilities of J. C. Pemberton, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Arthur P. Bagby, of Texas, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, reported a bill (S. No. 650) to remove the political disabilities of Arthur P. Bagby, of Texas; which was read twice by its title.

JEFFERSON KINDER.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Committee on Pensions have instructed me to report back the bill (S. No. 446) granting a pension to Jefferson Kinder. With permission I will state the peculiarity of the case. Upon application to the Commissioner of Pensions for the papers in the case in order to examine it, it was found that a portion of the papers had been lost. Without those papers a proper examination cannot be had. The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, so that the papers may go back to the Pension Bureau and the lost papers be substituted. That is all there is in the report, and I should be glad to have the action of the Senate upon the bill now, unless there is objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

SAMUEL LORD, JR., RECEIVER.

Mr. KERNAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 62) for the delivery to Samuel Lord, jr., receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. KERNAN. If there be no objection, I ask the Senate to consider the bill now. A similar bill was reported from the Committee on Finance and its passage recommended at the last session. The measure is now reported again with no dissent on the part of the committee. It involves the settlement of two insolvent estates, the debtor of one being insolvent and the other estate having been put in the hands of a receiver he is embarrassed in winding it up for the want of the relief afforded by this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. Let us hear what it is.

Mr. KERNAN. There is a short printed report with the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Let the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. There is a report stating the facts which can be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the bill taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York has asked to take it up by unanimous consent. The question has not been answered yet by the Senate. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. KERNAN February 7, 1879:

The Senate Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1235) for the delivery to Samuel Lord, jr., receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

That the State of South Carolina, by virtue of a law passed in 1854, issued bonds to the amount of $1,000,000 in aid of the Blue Ridge Railroad; that, upon such issue being made, the president, directors, and company of the State Bank of Charleston, South Carolina, a corporation created under the laws of that State prior to the year 1854, purchased one hundred of such bonds, each being for $1,000, and indorsed and numbered from 801 to 900, (both inclusive.) The bonds so purchased continued the property of the bank and in the possession of its officers from the time of their purchase until the 27th of February, 1865. On the day last named the bonds, with other papers and property of the bank, were in the custody of its cashier (Benjamin M. Lee) for safe-keeping, at a country house near Lynch's Creek, Kershaw District, South Carolina, and were then taken from him by a detachment of the forces of the United States under the command of General W. T. Sherman.

In April, 1866, D. Heaton, a special agent of the Treasury Department, transmitted from New Berne, North Carolina, to the Secretary of the Treasury, four of said bonds, numbered 812, 821, 836, and 837, stating that they had been turned over to him (Heaton) as captured property by the provost marshal of New Berne, North Carolina.

The bonds are now in the Treasury Department, and the sum of $479, which has been collected of the coupons for interest on the bonds, has been covered into the Treasury of the United States.

In 1869 the said corporation being insolvent, a receiver of its property and effects was appointed, and Samuel Lord, jr., is now such receiver.

The committee is of the opinion that the receiver is entitled to such bonds, and to the amount collected for interest thereon and covered into the Treasury.

They therefore report to the Senate, with an amendment, the said bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was the report made?

Mr. KERNAN. The report was made from the Committee on Finance at the last session. The bill then reported went on the Calendar and was not reached. The bill was reintroduced and referred to the committee again at this session; and the committee now report the bill, adopting the former report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have we any official report from the Secretary of the Treasury as to the history of these bonds?

Mr. KERNAN. The Secretary of the Treasury was written to, and all the facts stated in the report come from the Department. The bill was sent to him. The Secretary stated that the Department had no authority to examine the accounts over and that it would require action by Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the letter of the Secretary read before I decide whether the bill ought to go over.

Mr. KERNAN. The letter and papers were referred back, and I have not got them here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill had better go over until to-morrow morning, I think. Before it goes over I should like to ask whether this State bank is a mere private corporation, or whether it is an institution in which the State of South Carolina had or has an interest?

Mr. KERNAN. My understanding is that it is a private banking corporation in which the State had no interest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it were like some of the State banks that used to exist in different parts of the country, a bank of which the State was really the principal owner, then it would be worthy of consideration whether these bonds should not be applied to the direct tax supposed to be due from the State, which has not been paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes upon the Calendar.

Mr. BAYARD. Am I wrong in thinking that the Chair asked if there were objections to the consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did, and the Senator from Vermont objected.

Mr. BAYARD. But did not the Chair announce that there were no objections, so that the bill came before the Senate for want of objection?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. BAYARD. It is a question of memory. I had the impresssion that the bill was before the Senate for consideration, by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not the recollection of the Chair. The report of a committee can be considered on the day it is made only by unanimous consent.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 651) providing for the erection of a light-house at Anclote Key, in Hernando County, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 652) to appropriate money for the opening of the bar of Finholloway River, in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 653) to appropriate money for the establishment of beacon-lights and fog-bells along the shores of the Saint John's River, in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 654) to provide for the deepening of the channel at the mouth of the Saint John's River and the Volusia Bar at the head of Lake George, also the sea channel at Apalachicola, and of Tampa Bay and of the Suwanee River, and removing obstructions from the same, and for opening the channel inland from Fernandina to the Saint John's River, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 655) to amend section 2562 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the boundary-lines of the collection district of Saint Marks, in the State of Florida, and other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 656) to amend section 2305 of the Revised Statutes, which allows service in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to be deducted from the time required to perfect title to a homestead; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 657) authorizing certain Cherokee reservees to institute and prosecute suits before the courts of the United States for claims on account of reservations of lands taken by them in States east of the Mississippi River under the treaties of 1817, 1819, and prior treaties between the United States and the Cherokees; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WALKER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 658) to amend the act establishing the southern claims commission so as to extend the same to the Indian tribes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 659) providing for a settlement among the North Carolina Cherokees in regard to their lands in the State of North Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HILL, of Colorado, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 660) to amend an act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That Dr. Edward Evers have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

ARREST OF CHEROKEE INDIANS.

Mr. VOORHEES. I offer the following resolution for immediate action:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate of the circumstances which have led to the arrest and removal of J. M. Bell and other Cherokee Indians from the Cherokee Nation, of what offense, if any, they are guilty, and by what authority their arrest and removal have taken place. And further, that the Secretary be directed to furnish to the Senate any orders or instructions which may have been given for the arrest of any Cherokee citizens in any part of the Cherokee Nation over which, by the treaty of 1866 with such nation, it retains jurisdiction.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Bell, whose name is mentioned in the resolution, is a Cherokee Indian to me well known; I am personally acquainted with him. I hold in my hand a letter written by him to a party in this city which has been handed to me with liberty to use it. The letter is dated Arkansas City, Kansas, May 29, 1879, and is as follows:

DEAR COLONEL: This letter leaves me and my friends in a bad fix. Yesterday we were arrested by United States troops and brought across to this place. I was sick the whole route. The lieutenant told us that his instructions were from General Pope; his from the War Department. We were removed as trespassers, (and not allowed a hearing,) under penalty of having our entire property destroyed if we go back into the Territory. Now whatever is to be done must be done quickly. You must delay no time. We can stop in Kansas near this point. We will have to leave our hogs and some other things behind.

Yours, truly,

J. M. BELL.

The history of this matter in brief terms is stated to me in a letter which I hold in my hand from a very responsible gentleman, very familiar with this subject-matter. The letter is addressed to me and is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 3, 1879.

Hon. D. W. VOORHEES,
United States Senator:

I inclose a letter just received from J. M. Bell, a Cherokee Indian, and a relative of mine. His statements may be implicitly relied upon.

About a month ago Colonel Bell and some other Cherokees, for reasons good and sufficient, went to the Cherokee country west of ninety-seven degrees and made improvements; they took their stock and other property with them. Their settlement on this land had nothing whatever to do with the movement upon the "ceded" or "public lands" of the Territory about which so much has been said. Bell and his company were Cherokees, and had simply moved from one part of the Cherokee Nation to another. I believe the arrest of Colonel Bell and his companions and the threatened destruction of their property is to be ascribed to the ignorance of the officer in command. Like necessity, an officer on the frontier is not supposed to know any law; yet the injury and outrage to Bell and others is none the less. It would be interesting to know what the policy of this great Government really is in respect to the arrest of Indians by United States troops. One day we see Ponca Indians arrested by the soldiers, to be dragged into the Indian Territory, and the next we see Cherokee Indians arrested by the soldiers and dragged out of it.

Very respectfully,

ELIAS C. BOUDINOT.

It seems, therefore, Mr. President, that in the inscrutable workings of our Indian policy, Cherokee Indians have been arrested in the midst of a sort of panic which has been got up in that region of country, and that they have been taken out of their own Territory.

The object of the resolution which I have introduced is to give—and it is a charity to give—to the Secretary of War an opportunity to explain how this has come to pass. That is all I have to say in support of the resolution unless it should be antagonized.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to hear the resolution reported.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the word "guilty" there ought to be stricken out and the word "accused" probably put in.

Mr. VOORHEES. I accept that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Secretary of War probably could not tell what they are guilty of.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is better. I accept it at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so amended if there be no objection.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

ELECTIONS IN RHODE ISLAND.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine morning business is over, and the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] on the 27th of May, to refer to the select committee to inquire into alleged frauds in the late election so much of the memorial of J. B. Greene, of Rhode Island, as relates to the interference of Federal officers in the late election in that State, upon which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. As I am informed that my colleague will be here to-morrow I prefer to defer what little I may desire to say on this subject until he is in his seat, as he has charge of the matter. I therefore move to postpone the consideration of the resolution until to-morrow.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator will allow me to state that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is also absent, and may not be back until Friday.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] may not be here to-morrow, and the resolution had better be postponed until Friday.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say Friday for a further reason: the senior Senator from Rhode Island told me that it was probable he would not be here to-morrow; and even if the motion should prevail to postpone the resolution until to-morrow, I would not ask it to be considered for a moment in the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island. Therefore it is as well that the resolution should go over until Friday, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until Friday next.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. ROLLINS. Does not the unfinished business of yesterday morning now come up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour. The rule in respect to unfinished business only refers to business pending after the morning hour.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move, then, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which was under consideration during the morning hour yesterday with reference to the District water supply.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in line 6 of section 1, after the word "Columbia," to insert:

Excepting such powers and duties as belong to the Chief of Engineers.

So as to read:

That the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties and limitations provided in chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, excepting such powers and duties as belong to the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. ROLLINS. While the committee do not think this amendment absolutely necessary, and it may perhaps jeopardize the passage of the bill, still they will waive any objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I have not the bill before me; perhaps, if I had, such an amendment as I am going to allude to might not command the approval of the Senate. I should like, however, to see a provision in this bill or some other by which the liability of those who consume water will be made to depend upon their being furnished with what they pay for. In other words, I should like to see a provision which would enable every householder and water-tax payer to require a deduction made from the tax he is to pay if he is furnished with impure and unfit water.

I would be glad if I could get the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia to this subject. Instead of offering an amendment aimed at this object at the present moment, I will content myself with saying that should I live to return to another session of Congress, I shall offer a resolution directing either a special committee of the Senate raised for that purpose or the appropriate standing committee, to inquire into the causes of the impurity of the water delivered through the water-mains in Washington, to ascertain who is responsible for it, and what, if anything, is necessary to improve the quality of water brought here. I do not wish to repeat what I said yesterday——

Mr. ROLLINS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from New York that the commissioners of the District of Columbia do not have charge of the water until it reaches the city. The aqueduct, or the main conduit, is in charge of the Engineer Corps, and does not come under the charge of the commissioners of the District of Columbia. They are not responsible, therefore, for the quality of the water which is furnished.

Mr. CONKLING. If the commissioners of the District were responsible, I should not wish to reflect upon them. The Chief of Engineers being responsible, I do not wish to reflect upon him. Without reflecting upon anybody, I wish to call attention to the fact that the business of supplying water to this city is ill done; that with a great river to draw from, with an abundant head to carry water to every part of this city and to carry it I think to the upper stories of nearly every inhabited building in this city, there is a failure in two respects: first the water is not carried to the upper stories of the domiciles which it is intended to supply; and second the water which is brought here is unfit for the purposes for which it is brought. That I undertake to affirm of my own knowledge after the observation of years. My belief is that nothing on this subject is more incumbent upon the two Houses of Congress than some measure to put an end to this evil, and I say again that should I find myself here at another session of Congress, I will venture to move, in the hope that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to adopt the motion, that some appropriate committee inquire into the cause of these difficulties and make report, so that we may know who is responsible if it is the dereliction of anybody, and that we may also know what further provision is necessary, if further provision be necessary, in order to enable the business of bringing and delivering water in Washington to be done as well as it is customarily done everywhere else as far as I know.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BURNSIDE in the chair.) Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I venture to interrupt the proceedings for one moment to speak of a communication which I find on my desk and which I have had only a momentary opportunity to look at. It comes from a resident and a tax-payer on Capitol Hill, and it objects strenuously to this bill, affirming that it will be a failure in his opinion in respect of the object at which it aims. He incloses a substitute or an amendment which I have handed to the Senator from New Hampshire who has charge of this matter, not feeling sufficiently instructed in it myself to venture to do more than make this suggestion. But this writer, who is evidently a man of intelligence, and obviously one of those suffering now from the lack of water, affirms his belief, after examining this bill, that it will not answer the purpose, and that a different provision is required. I merely bring this to the notice of the Senator who has charge of the bill, not feeling, as I say, sufficiently informed about it to venture to move an amendment myself.

Mr. ROLLINS. This plan suggests the construction of a new thirty-six-inch main to Capitol Hill. This plan has been considered and discussed at considerable length before the committee. It may be necessary ultimately to do something of this kind; but in the judgment of the committee it will be better to wait until the great main or conduit is extended to the vicinity of Fourteenth street and then whatever additional mains may be necessary can be placed to much better advantage than now can be done.

The money to be appropriated under this bill will not be wasted even if the supply obtained is not sufficient for Capitol Hill. It is proposed to lay a pipe down Fifteenth street. This is necessary whether it gives the supply or not. It is necessary in order to avoid a large detour, the water for South Washington now having to come to New Jersey avenue near the Capitol and then to be conducted by a twenty-inch pipe to South Washington. It will save this long detour; it will be better for South Washington and is necessary in any event. Those best informed on the subject think it will do very much toward increasing the supply on Capitol Hill, and in this opinion the committee unanimously concur. I hope the bill will pass.

The bill was passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the title by striking out "the" before "powers" and inserting the word "certain," because we do not now confer on the commissioners all the powers in that section but only a part of them.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

E. E. RICE.

Mr. EATON. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan, which will take but a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was the bill reported?

Mr. EATON. A week ago, I should think. It has been on the Calendar a long while.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill was reported May 27.

Mr. EATON. It passed the Senate at the last session, but did not reach the House in time for action there. The committee again report the same bill they did at the last session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we are going to legislate on all manner of subjects at this session, it would be better to take up the Calendar in its order, or have some sort of understanding about it. I do not know where the line ought to be drawn, but it apparently is not drawn anywhere. I dare say the bill is all right. My only objection is that I do not want to take up anything.

Mr. EATON. I agree with the Senator from Vermont as to the transaction of general business; but this is a gentleman who was formerly a consul of the United States. The committees of both Houses agreed to the bill at the last session. It did not pass the House but did the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides for paying to Elisha E. Rice $2,250 coin in full payment for certain lots, and improvements thereon, in Hakodadi, Japan, conveyed by him to the United States, and used for consular purposes.

Mr. EATON. I need only say with regard to this bill that Mr. Rice was consul of the United States at this point in Japan. In 1873 he conveyed to the United States the title to certain property, and upon appraisement it was found to amount to precisely the sum which the Committee on Foreign Relations have reported now. Last session the committee reported the same bill and it passed the Senate unanimously. It did not pass the House, for want of time. I hope and believe that there can be no objection to its passage now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Was this gentleman a consul of the United States?

Mr. EATON. He was. He conveyed the property to the United States upon the request of the officials of the United States, and the Secretary of State has informed the committee that this matter ought to be settled. A bill was reported at the last session to pay him. Our consular officers are now on this very ground. This money should have been paid this man six years ago rather than to-day. Now it ought to be paid at once.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. GARLAND. If there be no further business in the morning hour I ask the Senate to take up the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 572.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 572) to amend an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places of holding courts in said districts." It proposes to repeal so much of the act of February 24, 1879, as provides that Jackson County shall be embraced in the western judicial district of Texas.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment, to add the following:

And all civil causes of action which have accrued in said county, of which the courts of the United States have jurisdiction, shall be cognizable in the court at Galveston, but all offenses committed in said county against the laws of the United States before the passage of this act shall be cognizable in the court of the western district, as provided in said act of the 24th of February, 1879.

SEC. 2. That so much of the act to which this is an amendment as makes all process against defendants residing in the counties of Aransas, Duval, Nueces, La Salle, Zapata, San Patricio, Refugio, Dimmit, Webb, Encinal, and Maverick returnable to Brownsville is hereby repealed, and such process is hereby made returnable to San Antonio; and all causes of civil action which have accrued in said counties, or either of them, since the passage of the act to which this is an amendment, or which shall hereafter accrue, shall be cognizable in the court at San Antonio.

SEC. 3. Civil actions or proceedings now pending against parties residing in either of said counties in the courts named in the first and second sections hereof, as provided in the act to which this is an amendment, may, on the application of either party, be transferred to the proper court of said district under this act; and in case of such transfer, all papers and files therein, with copies of all journal entries, shall be transferred to the office of the clerk of such court; and the same shall proceed in all respects as though originally commenced in said court.

SEC. 4. The several districts as established in the act to which this is an amendment are hereby declared to be a part of the fifth judicial circuit; and the courts of the said northern district shall have the same jurisdiction as is conferred by law upon the courts of the eastern and western districts of said State; and the circuit court for said northern district shall be held twice a year at ——, on ——.

SEC. 5. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] has an amendment that he wishes to offer to section 3, line 10, after the word "court."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to the amendment?

Mr. GARLAND. It can be so considered. I will state that I am perfectly willing so far as I am concerned to accept the amendment of the Senator from Texas, but it has been prepared since the report of the committee, and I cannot speak for the committee. I think there will be no objection to his amendment.

Mr. COKE. I will offer my amendment now, if it be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. COKE. I send it to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is, after the word "court," in line 10, section 3, to insert:

And civil actions or proceedings now pending in the circuit courts at Brownsville, Austin, Galveston, or Tyler, which under this act would be cognizable in some other district, may, on the application of either party, be transferred to the proper court of said district; and in case of such transfer all papers and files therein, with copies of all journal entries, shall be transferred to the office of the clerk of such court, and the same shall proceed in all respects as though originally commenced in said court.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND. I have another amendment. I move to strike out, in section 4, line 7, all after the word "at," and insert:

Waco on the first Mondays in April and October; at Dallas on the first Mondays in June and December; and at Graham on the first Mondays in February and August; and the circuit court shall be held at Jefferson, in the eastern district, on the second Mondays in February and September, and at San Antonio, in the western district, on the first Mondays in May and November.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT FUNDED INDEBTEDNESS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District, which was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia yesterday or the day before.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think there was an understanding some time ago that the bonded indebtedness of this District should not be increased.

Mr. HARRIS. If it is in order, I will say to the Senator from Delaware that this is not an increase of the bonded debt. It is a simple proposition to issue 5 per cent. bonds with which to take up other bonds of the city bearing a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent. It is a proposition to reduce the rate of interest which the District of Columbia is now paying upon a portion of her debt. That is the whole of it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What higher rate of interest?

Mr. HARRIS. Six, seven, and in one instance eight per cent. on bonds payable at the pleasure of the District that may now be paid off by the issue of these bonds at 5 per cent.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I rose for the purpose of being informed as to the object of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District.

Mr. HARRIS. I send to the Secretary's desk a communication from the commissioners of the District of Columbia upon the subject, which will explain the whole matter; and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 2, 1879.

SIR: The commissioners have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of this date requesting their views in regard to House bills Nos. 1380 and 1894, and in response to express their approval of the same as measures of great importance to the best interests of the District of Columbia, and the earnest hope that they will be speedily and favorably considered by your committee and by the Senate.

The passage of bill No. 1380 will enable the commissioners to make a large reduction in the annual interest now payable on the District debt, by the substitution of 5 per cent. bonds for bonds now outstanding, payable at pleasure and carrying higher rates of interest. This bill includes the issue of bonds provided for by act of 23d December, 1878; the commissioners having ascertained that the negotiation of a larger amount could be effected on more satisfactory terms than that named therein.

The passage of bill No. 1894 will, they believe, provide necessary and effective means for the protection and improvement of the public health.

Very respectfully, by order of the board:

J. DENT,
President pro tempore.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Chairman of Senate Committee on District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. Now I ask for the reading of a copy of a letter addressed to the committee some time ago.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 24, 1879.

SIR: It is found probable that the 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia cannot be sold at par if issued in accordance with the provisions of the recent act of Congress authorizing the commissioners to sell $281,500 of bonds to redeem certain bonds that fell due January 1 and March 1 last. More favorable terms can be obtained for a loan of some magnitude than for one so small as that above mentioned. There are now due, and payable at pleasure, $940,800 of 6 per cent. bonds, and $53,000 of 5 per cent. bonds. There will be $20,000 of 8 per cent. bonds due in 1881, and $20,000 of 6 per cent. bonds in 1884. On July 1, 1891, $4,000,000 of 6 per cent and $670,000 of 7 per cent. bonds fall due.

The amounts now payable at pleasure, together with the $281,500 first above referred to, and the small amounts falling due shortly aggregate $1,315,550. The sinking fund applicable to the old debt, on the basis of the appropriations for the years 1879 and 1880, will hardly suffice to pay off more than one-third of this amount before provision will have to be made for the larger amounts falling due in 1891. The commissioners are therefore of the opinion that it is advisable to take up the larger portion of the 6 per cent. bonds now payable at pleasure by substituting 5 per cent. bonds, and they ask for general authority to substitute 5 per cent. bonds, interest not to exceed that rate, for any indebtedness of the District bearing a higher rate of interest than 5 per cent.

By order of the board:

S. L. PHELPS, President.

Hon. J. G. HARRIS,
Chairman Senate Committee on the District.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have not given any attention to this matter, and of course know little about it; but if I have heard the reading of the bill aright it authorizes bonds to be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury and the proceeds applied to the redemption of other District bonds bearing a higher rate of interest. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether there is any limitation upon the price at which these bonds are to be sold.

Mr. HARRIS. Not below par.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is no greater amount of these bonds to be issued, I understand, than those which are already out at a higher rate of interest?

Mr. HARRIS. The amount of these bonds to be issued and sold is limited by the amount of bonds redeemed bearing a higher rate of interest, and no greater amount can be issued.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I did not know whether that was provided for or not, and therefore I asked for information.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. CONKLING. If I can have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee I should like to ask a question.

It happened some years ago when local improvements were progressing in Washington that changes of grade and other things damaged property in many places. The cost of the improvements was assessed upon the property and paid in many instances to which I now refer; I believe there were contests, but most persons paid. Subsequently it turned out that overpayments had been made in effect; in other words, that the damage which the owners had sustained and which was deemed proper matter of offset diminished the assessments which had been made, or, stating it somewhat more exactly, entitled them to a refund or rebate. That rebate was made, and certificates were issued, and as I understand those certificates are held to this day, no payment ever having been made upon them, the board of public works and the board of audit having disappeared, and there being nobody to whom to appeal. So the case stands thus: the owner of a lot was assessed $1,400 for the improvements, as they were called, made near that lot. Subsequently, upon a review of the whole case it was adjudged that $700 should be refunded to him. He received a certificate of $700, and that certificate has been virtually blank paper so far; he is remediless; he has no way of getting back the $700 excess which he paid. I think I state the case definitely enough to enable the Senator from Tennessee and my friend from New Hampshire to know the class of indebtedness to which I refer.

Now, as I see other creditors are here being provided for, I ask what is proposed, if anything, in respect of these, as I think very meritorious, persons who paid and paid in money sums which it was afterward decided they were not liable to pay and which should be refunded to them and who to this day have never been able to receive one penny?

Perhaps it may be said that it does not appropriately belong to this bill. I do not see why not. It seems to me that if there is any class of creditors who may justly be deemed more meritorious than another, it is that class who promptly and voluntarily paid and paid in money assessments made upon them and who were afterward decided to have made excessive payments and to be entitled to receive back a part and who in truth have never received a penny. I can hardly think of a stronger case of equity in regard to any creditor than that. I assume that this bill does not cover their case, and I should like to inquire what is proposed in respect of these certificates and whether there is any reason why they should not be provided for here as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I can only say to the Senator from New York that the question suggested by him is one that is under consideration in the Committee on the District of Columbia. Those cases are not provided for by this bill. There is only one single class of creditors referred to in this bill that it is proposed to provide for, and that proposition is based upon the idea of reducing the rate of interest now being paid by the District of Columbia upon that class of indebtedness that the District of Columbia has a right to pay at its pleasure. The class of creditors, highly meritorious I grant, referred to by the Senator from New York, are not provided for, nor was it intended to provide for them or any other class, except the one I have referred to, by this bill. The matter, however, is under consideration, in the hands of a sub-committee now, if I may state that with propriety; is being considered as to how that class of creditors are to be provided for. The whole subject of special assessments (many of which were grossly erroneous and excessive) is undergoing revision and investigation, and I hope at an early day the committee may be able to report at least its own views as to what action it will be proper for Congress to take in the premises.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether, as far as he is advised, the committee intend to report at this session?

Mr. HARRIS. Upon the general subject?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not speak so much upon the general subject as upon the particular point to which I have endeavored to draw attention.

Mr. HARRIS. My individual opinion is that it is not probable a bill will be reported at the present extra session of Congress covering the question suggested by the honorable Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it is not for me to suggest the order of business to the Committee on the District of Columbia; but I venture, with great respect to that committee, to say that they have not now in charge, nor has there been before the committee at any time, a more urgent matter touching common right in the District than this which I bring to the notice of the Senate. These occurrences were years ago; and in the hope of stimulating somewhat the interest of the Senator from Tennessee, I will mention one case which fell under my observation.

Some four or five years ago a lot was sold in this city. The purchaser of the lot understood it to be clear of all incumbrance. After his purchase, he found that liens in the nature of local assessments rested upon that lot. He paid these assessments by installments as they fell due one after another, until he had paid $1,800. Subsequently the appropriate tribunal, not moved by him, he presenting no evidence whatever, but in the course of their own impartial investigation, found out that about $800 of the $1,800 that he had paid was in excess of the true measure of his liability. Thereupon they awarded about $800 to him to be refunded of his money which he had paid. The vendor of the lot, from whom he bought it, hearing of this came in and claimed the money. One of the officers in charge,—I will not name him; he is gone now,—moving in rather an eccentric circle as it would seem to a lawyer, was in great doubt whether the man who had sold this lot free of incumbrance was not entitled to receive what his vendee had been fraudulently compelled to pay afterwards, and refused to deliver the certificate to the buyer of the lot. Thereupon this man was compelled to file a bill in equity, which he did, to go through a contest in the courts here, which cost him in the neighborhood of $500, to ascertain to the satisfaction of this functionary whether he or the man who had not this imposition upon him was entitled to receive the certificate, and at last the court decided the case, and of course decided that the purchaser of the lot who had paid the money was entitled to receive back this $800.

Thereupon, with much ceremony, the certificate was delivered over to him, and to this day he has held that certificate, never being able to receive one shilling upon it.

So the account as to that particular tax-payer stands thus: He bought a lot represented to be free of incumbrance. He paid about $1,800 of special assessment upon it afterwards, which was a surprise and a wrong upon him. Then he expended about $500, beside his own personal exertions, to establish in the courts his right to whatever refund there was. Then he received a certificate for between seven and eight hundred dollars, certifying that he was entitled to his own money which he had been thus wrongfully compelled to pay, which he had been thus mulcted in court in costs in order to establish his right to receive back—that of that money he was entitled to between seven and eight hundred dollars; but to this day he holds that certificate, never having been paid anything at all. Thus upon him a wrong of between one and two thousand dollars has been inflicted, and now he is being punished for the readiness, the willingness with which he responded to a questionable assessment, in place of refusing and contesting it.

That is one case. My honorable friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests that he might have a claim upon the vendor. I suppose the Senator from Connecticut never heard in his State of any such thing as beating a man on an execution. He does not know what that is.

Mr. EATON. That does not answer the query at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Did the Senator ever hear of the right to shear the wolf?

Mr. EATON. I have.

Mr. CONKLING. If he has tried it, he has ascertained that the fleece is not worth the cutting.

Mr. EATON. Doubtless.

Mr. CONKLING. That sufficiently answers the question. In the case I have been stating the only remedy practically on earth this man has is to receive, if he can, upon the certificate the amount which it was certified years ago he was entitled to receive back of his own money paid to the city of Washington as an assessment.

That is one case. It may be, probably is, an aggravated case; but I am told that there are scores of cases of the same kind, excepting only the fact of the party having been driven into court to establish his right. I do not wonder that the Senator from Tennessee said that certainly this was a meritorious class of creditors. I undertake to say that there is no class of creditors in this District whose equities appeal so loudly to a sense of justice as this class; and yet although I have ventured to ask in regard to them last year and the year before and the year before that, once or twice publicly in the Senate, frequently in private of members of the committee, I have always heard, as I hear now from the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that the committee was considering that question, and that although the particular member responding was not authorized to commit anybody, did not wish to be too free in really expressing his own opinion, yet his impression was that probably at some time, in some bill, some provision which might be thought right would or could or should or possibly might some time or other be made.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, yes.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Committee on the District of Columbia did at the last session very carefully consider this question, and report to the Senate on the 3d day of February a bill relating to assessments for special improvements in the District of Columbia covering this whole ground. The fact that it was not considered by the Senate was not the fault of the Committee on the District of Columbia, for I think those Senators who are here now who were members of the last Senate will bear the committee witness that they endeavored on all suitable occasions to press the consideration of matters relating to the District of Columbia. It was not the fault of the committee that the subject was not considered by the Senate. The bill was reported and was on the Calendar here for a month; and I very much fear now, if a bill should be reported to-morrow from the Committee on the District of Columbia on this subject, objections would be made and the matter would go over until the next session of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New Hampshire, I hope, did not understand me as blaming the Committee on the District of Columbia. If I felt at liberty to blame anybody for anything, (which I do not,) the Committee on the District of Columbia would be the last body that I should ever venture to blame. Oh, no, Mr. President, I am not blaming the Committee on the District of Columbia; far from it. I am speaking of the fact, and I venture to say in seriousness that it cries aloud as I think for the attention of somebody.

Since the honorable Senator from New Hampshire rose to interrupt me I have become indebted to another Senator for a fact bearing upon this which had escaped my recollection, and I venture to contribute that also to this subject. In addition to all the other injustice involved in the proceeding in question, Congress by an act provided that the certificates of which I have spoken, certificates given to men informing them that they were to receive back the overpayments that they had made, might be funded into bonds. Those who have been fortunate enough, or diligent enough, or sharp enough to push ahead and get their claims considered first and get their certificates in hand first, went immediately and received bonds for the amount of their certificates, interest-bearing bonds, which bonds have been paid as to the principal and interest. I remember hearing it said, and truly enough, one evening in the Senate that not to pay promptly the interest on those bonds would be the worst sort of repudiation; and the interest was voted specially. But before the other entitled persons came here, those who assumed that good faith was to be observed all around and that they need not be sleeping with one eye open and one foot out of bed to chase the Government before breakfast in the morning, but who took it for granted that all would be done in the regular way, were suddenly caught by a repeal of this act, and as the tree fell, so it lies. I have before me a statement showing that a large number of these certificate holders who were quick, vigilant, hungry, obtained their bonds, and another large number, equally meritorious, or, as I think, looking to reasonable behavior and conduct of men dealing with their Government, more meritorious because they had been a little more restful upon the good faith of the Government and had not sought to save a little interest by possessing themselves of their bonds at the earliest hour—this large number of at least equally meritorious persons were left, and are left to this day; so that their neighbors, with cases in no respect distinguishable from theirs, have been paid principal and interest, and here they stand entirely unrequited.

Now, I think if an element was lacking to complete the equities of the case that element has been supplied. Disclaiming again, as I do with the utmost sincerity, any intention to impute any shortcoming or dereliction to the Committee on the District, because I have no idea any such thing could truly be imputed to that committee, I venture in all earnestness to hope that the committee and all its members will see that a very early day is the proper day to attend to this subject. I do not see why it should not be a provision in this very bill that these certificate holders who are tabulated and totalized should be allowed now to receive, as the other holders of the same certificates received, bonds, and bonds as of that date, because some three years at least have elapsed, and I know of no reason why these men should not be paid both the money which they themselves paid into the Treasury and also the interest upon it of the same date and at the same rate which has already been paid to their neighbors.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, so far from differing with the Senator from New York in the views that he has just expressed, I am inclined to thank him for calling attention to and emphasizing the wrongs that have been perpetrated upon the class of creditors to whom he has referred, and I hope at an early day, certainly an early day of the next session, if not at this session, to be able to report a bill to the Senate that will remedy the evil of which he so justly complains. But I do not think it would be wise or proper to add as an amendment to this bill the feature that he suggests. I therefore hope that the bill will be permitted to pass without amendment, and I also hope that either at the present or at a very early day in the next session I shall be able to present to the Senate such a measure as will remedy the evil that the Senator from New York has so pointedly laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

The SPEAKER. The committee are compelled to report within one week.

Mr. CONGER. I call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that the morning hour cannot be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection it can be reported before the morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. I do not care about this case, but I want to preserve the rule in its integrity.

Mr. SCALES. What is the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized to report the resolution.

The original resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform this House, first, at what date the Pawnee, Modoc, and Nez Percé Indians were removed to the Indian Territory; second, what the populations of said Indians were respectively at the time of such removal; and, third, how many have died since such removal.

The amendments proposed by the committee were as follows:

After the words "Nez Percé" insert "Ponca and Cheyenne;" after the word "died" insert the words "in each tribe;" and add after the word "removal" "and the cause, so far as known of such mortality;" so that, when amended, it will read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to inform this House, first, at what date the Pawnee, Modoc, Nez Percé, Ponca and Cheyenne Indians were removed to the Indian Territory; second, what the populations of said Indians were respectively at the time of such removal; and, third, how many have died in each tribe since such removal, and the cause, so far as known, of such mortality.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. SCALES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

M. O'BRIEN & CO.

Mr. WADDILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2161) for the relief of M. O'Brien & Co.; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HARBOR OF REFUGE, MISSOURI.

Mr. FROST, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2162) to provide for a survey for a harbor of refuge at or near Saint Louis, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. SPRINGER. On Monday last I introduced a bill for the relief of George Bancroft, a private of Company G, Fifth Illinois Cavalry, and had it referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I have since ascertained that that reference is incorrect, and I now ask unanimous consent that the reference be changed to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

UNITED STATES COURT-ROOMS, KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2163) to provide for the construction of suitable rooms for the use of the United States circuit and district courts in the public building to be erected in the city of Kansas, in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

MOORHEAD, MINNESOTA.

Mr. WASHBURN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2164) to create Moorhead, in the State of Minnesota and in the collection district of Minnesota, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COMMERCE.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire and report wherein existing laws can be so amended as to afford relief to the commercial interests of the country, and what measures can be adopted by the Congress of the United States calculated to secure a return of their commercial prosperity by means both of an increase of trade with foreign nations and a profitable extension of the business of their merchant marine.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORTON MONUMENTAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) donating condemned cannon to the Morton Monumental Association, of Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

Mr. POEHLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2165) to amend section 2297, title 32 of the Revised Statutes, relating to homestead settlers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK SCHAUM.

Mr. POEHLER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2166) granting a pension to Frederick Schaum; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JAMES B. WOOD.

Mr. POEHLER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2167) for the relief of James B. Wood, late captain and assistant adjutant-general; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JOSEPH P. WILSON.

Mr. POEHLER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2168) for the relief of Joseph P. Wilson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ELECTRICAL PAGE-CALL.

Mr. POUND. I ask consent to submit for reference the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be, and he is hereby, authorized to procure suitable electrical instruments and cause the same to be placed in this Hall as early as practicable, with such arrangements and connections as will enable members and officers of the House to summon pages, the number and arrangements to be approved by the Speaker: Provided, That such instruments so duly placed shall be fully guaranteed, and together with all labor and other expenses shall not cost to exceed the sum of $2,000, the same, when duly audited, to be paid from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CONGER. That should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should go to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I call for the regular order.

Mr. POUND. What has become of the resolution? Was it referred?

The SPEAKER. It was not referred; nor is it before the House. The Chair supposes that the demand for the regular order made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] was for the purpose of keeping out this proposition.

Mr. POUND. I desire to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONGER. I think it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POUND. I supposed that permission was given for the introduction of bills and resolutions for reference at this time.

The SPEAKER. General permission was not given; each proposition as submitted was for unanimous consent. The objection to this resolution was held in reserve until it was read, in order that the House might know what was its subject-matter; otherwise it could not be intelligently objected to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask leave to report a joint resolution from the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] withdraw his call for the regular order?

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty-four minutes after twelve o'clock.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it was expected that some one on the opposite side would occupy the morning hour to-day; but it is intimated to me that it is not the wish of any gentleman on the opposite side to proceed to-day, and therefore, by general consent, the Committee on Appropriations might be allowed to report their bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has insisted on the regular order. He would have to withdraw that demand in order to enable the House, by consent, to hear reports from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The House might dispense with the morning hour, as gentlemen on the other side are not ready to proceed with the discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] moves that the morning hour be dispensed with.

The question being taken, the motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business coming over from the last legislative day when this class of business was before the House is an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe a quorum did not vote.

The SPEAKER. A motion was made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] to lay the appeal on the table; and on that motion a quorum did not vote.

Mr. FINLEY. The yeas and nays were called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the Journal so far as relates to the subject-matter coming up as unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAY 28, 1879.

Mr. SPRINGER having proposed to submit an amendment to Rule 51,

Mr. CONGER made the point of order that the motion to proceed to dispose of business on the Speaker's table, which motion he made, took precedence of any other business, and that the motion of Mr. SPRINGER was not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER overruled the point of order on the ground that Mr. SPRINGER had been recognized for the purpose stated by him, but that, objection being made, the resolution must lie over one day under the rule, and thereupon directed the reading of the said resolution.

Mr. CONGER objected to its being read, and appealed from the decision of the Chair; pending which

Mr. MCMAHON moved that the said appeal do lie on the table, on which motion the yeas and nays were ordered; pending which

Mr. BREWER (at one o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn; and the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 11, nays 186, not voting 88.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. MCMAHON, that the appeal of Mr. CONGER from the decision of the Chair do lie on the table, and being put, the roll was thereupon called, and the name of Mr. POEHLER having been called,

Mr. HUNTON made the point of order that the hour of two o'clock p. m. having arrived, reports were now in order from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER sustained the point of order; and the roll-call was thereupon suspended.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it advisable to direct that the roll be again called from the beginning.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Chair please state the question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] appealed from the decision of the Chair in recognizing the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] independent motions being then in order, to introduce a modification of the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. "Independent motions being then in order?"

The SPEAKER. There was what is known in legislation as a gap.

Mr. GARFIELD. I thought the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois was introduced for reference in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That was on Monday last. In that case an appeal is also pending. This is another appeal and is not in the morning hour.

Mr. FINLEY. Should not so much of the roll-call as was taken stand? Some members who answered to their names are now absent. Should not their votes be counted?

The SPEAKER. There has been no record kept of the names that were called; at least the Chair did not see such list in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. FINLEY. I see by the RECORD that the roll had been partly called.

Mr. CONGER. If I may be allowed to make the remark without offense to any one, I will say that the object I had was accomplished on a former occasion, which was to carry that matter over. Unless the Chair is desirous to have some expression of opinion by the House, I will withdraw my appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not anxious about it. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws his appeal.

Mr. CONGER. I do not think it will be derogatory to the Chair or to myself if I pursue that course.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing in the matter derogatory to any one.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to withdraw the appeal without prejudice to the Chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. If the appeal is withdrawn, the resolution goes over for one day, as I understand.

The SPEAKER. It goes over under the ruling of the Chair. The resolution was not read when the controversy occurred, even the reading being objected to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire that it be now read.

Mr. CONGER. The resolution goes over.

The SPEAKER. It will go over.

Mr. CONGER. My opinion is that we can meet the question just as well when it comes up again as now. I understand that an appropriation bill is to be reported, and I do not wish to obstruct that class of business.

Mr. SPRINGER. All that I desire is that the resolution be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule 51 be amended by adding thereto the following:

And any pending measure reported, but not disposed of, shall be regarded as unfinished business, and shall be in order after the morning hour of any day when such business would be in order.

The SPEAKER. This goes over under the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair state in what order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has some reports to make from said committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. But I wish to ask a question, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this resolution amending the rules. When it comes up will it be in order to move to refer it to the Committee on Rules? In other words, what is its status?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It has not been referred to the Committee on Rules, but will come up for action.

Mr. GARFIELD. For action or reference?

The SPEAKER. If the majority of the House so desires, it can be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. In what order of business, if the Chair pleases?

The SPEAKER. It will come up under the third order of business—resolutions where debate has arisen and laid over under the rules.

OCEAN NATIONAL BANK OF NEW YORK, ETC.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise for the purpose of making a privileged report from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am directed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to submit the following resolution and to ask that it be put upon its passage at once.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and they are hereby, instructed and directed to investigate the affairs of the Ocean National Bank of New York, and of the German National Bank of Chicago, and especially to inquire into the management of the assets of the respective receivers of said banks, and the conduct of any officer of the Government touching the said receiverships or the disposition of the assets of said banks, respectively, and for that purpose that the said committee, or any sub-committee it may appoint, shall have power to send for persons and papers, reduce the testimony of witnesses to writing, employ a clerk and stenographer, to sit during the recess of Congress at Chicago and New York, and to report by bill or otherwise. And the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House to defray the expenses of said investigation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this matter whether this investigation cannot be made here without sending the committee off? It seems to me we are incurring large expenses in sending committees away from the Capitol, and I do not see anything in the affairs of two organized banks which may not be investigated here as well as upon the ground. The officers can be summoned here, and all the necessary evidence, it seems to me, can be taken at the Capitol.

Mr. BUCKNER. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that it is the expectation of the committee the House will adjourn in a short time, and that these investigations could not take place during the present session of Congress, and therefore in order to save expense, as the witnesses all reside in Chicago and New York, it was thought to be best to have the investigation take place where these banks are located. So far as I am concerned, if the investigation could take place now I should much prefer it, but I do not believe it could be finished during the present session of Congress. If anything shall be done it should be before the next session of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. Generally, I will say to the gentleman, investigations are less expensive when conducted here, and traveling committees always create the impression we are incurring unnecessarily large expenses in having members travel over the country. If there is any special reason, however, why this committee should be sent out, then the House ought to grant it; but unless there is some such special reason I should prefer the investigation should take place here.

Mr. BUCKNER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman state the reason for having the investigation at all? There may be good reason for it which I do not know. Upon what ground do we mean to make an investigation at all into the affairs of the two banks named?

Mr. BUCKNER. The investigation of these banks is demanded by petitions stating facts which, if true, show that investigation ought to be made, especially as to the conduct of the receiver of the Chicago bank. I cannot go into details, but that receiver is charged with not doing his duty as to the assets of the bank, and thereby operating to the injury of the depositors and stockholders.

Mr. GARFIELD. Have the committee consulted the Comptroller of the Currency to find how the record stands there?

Mr. BUCKNER. I think not.

Mr. GARFIELD. It may be that all the facts the gentleman wants are in the possession of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. BUCKNER. But there are some facts outside.

Mr. GARFIELD. It seems to me it ought to be known, first, before we order an investigation, what the record shows, because it may be that at the end of the investigation we may reach only what is already known in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

I wish the gentleman would let this lie over and make inquiry, so that he can say to the House the facts cannot be got hold of at the office here.

Mr. BUCKNER. I am satisfied that the facts, so far as the National Bank of Chicago is concerned, cannot be obtained by anything within the reach of the Comptroller.

Mr. GARFIELD. If we know that after having made inquiry, then the investigation can be made.

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no doubt about it. The facts stated to us by the stockholders through their attorney justify me in making that statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Missouri will remember the law is exceedingly stringent as to the reports to be made by all banks, and especially those in the hands of a receiver It seems to me if the Comptroller is doing his duty, as I have no doubt he is, he must have very complete and frequent communications from the receivers. I would like for one to know if that be not so.

Mr. HAWLEY. So far as the Ocean Bank of New York is concerned I have had occasion on behalf of constituents in my State to know something about it for five or six years back. The affairs of that bank were before the Committee on Banking and Currency five years ago, and there was considerable investigation then; and it is my impression that the gentleman from Missouri will find a great mass of facts about it in the Department, and that Comptroller Knox is familiar with the whole matter from beginning to end. It is also my impression that, so far as the general public are concerned, the bill-holders are entirely secured. Now, how far the Government should expend sums of money to secure stockholders, who are not to be regarded by us more than stockholders of manufacturing companies, I do not know. The stockholders are to lose, but the general public and the bill-holders, whom we especially regard, are safe. I think the gentleman will find a very full history of that concern down at the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will say to my friend from Missouri that these investigations by Congress are becoming very common and sometimes I think are wholly unnecessary. My friend, who is familiar with the practice of the Department, will recollect that when a bank is in liquidation or in the hands of a receiver, the Department sends out officers of the Government to investigate all the business of the bank. And these stockholders who make their complaints to Congress make their complaints also to the Comptroller of the Currency, and I have no doubt he has all the facts before him which are now sought to be obtained by an investigating committee; for the same parties who would give testimony before a committee of Congress have already given testimony before the officers sent out by the Department.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I hope my friend from Missouri will press this inquiry. The people are interested in this banking system beyond the mere bill-holders of the banks. Every gentleman acquainted with the finances of the country, its commerce, and its trade, must know that the deposits in the banks form a great portion of the currency of the country. We ought to look into the national-bank system and probe it to the bottom, and if my friend from Missouri will do so, I think he will expose the rottenness of the national-bank system of the country. The great interests of the people require this. I trust we will first test the protection offered by the office of the Comptroller of Currency, and then, with all deference to my friend from Virginia, that the Representatives of the people will investigate the facts and expose the corruptions of the system.

Mr. FERDON. There are certain reasons why there should be an investigation in regard to the affairs of the Ocean Bank. If there is any one on this floor who is more interested than another in the Ocean Bank it may perhaps be myself. We are very likely to be interested in those things which have cost us something. In connection with the Ocean Bank there will in no way be a loss to depositors who have deposited their money in that bank. They will be paid every dollar. The stockholders have not only lost their stock but they have been largely assessed for the purpose of paying the depositors. They have been assessed, I think, some 40 or 50 per cent. in order to reimburse the depositors for loss caused by the failure of that bank.

Of course we are not here for the purpose of saying anything about the causes of the failure. If I understand it correctly, the resolution now before the House is simply for an investigation of the manner in which the affairs of the bank have been conducted since they have been in the hands of a receiver. The receiver of that bank has been in the discharge of his duty as such for several years. He had to deal with a great many matters which were of little value in the assets, and it has taken him undoubtedly a long while to wind up the affairs of the bank and to make the most of its assets.

But I wish to say here I think there is a misconception in the minds of certain members of the House in supposing that any loss at all will accrue to depositors. The loss simply accrues and very largely to the stockholders of the bank who have lost their stock and a very large percentage besides. The depositors have been fully paid. The last payment made of 5 per cent. gives them one hundred cents on the dollar, and besides this 30 per cent. has been paid them as interest on their deposits.

The receiver and Comptroller of Currency have finally made this overture in regard to the interest upon the amount which the depositors had in the bank, and that is that they take 30 per cent. as their interest, and that the whole matter then shall be settled up. Now, the men really interested in the investigation are the stockholders, and if they all feel as I do, they would like to have this investigation to know whether they have been honestly and honorably treated in the affair.

Mr. BUCKNER. I desire to say a word only upon this question. The Committee on Banking and Currency did not desire this investigation at all. We would be very glad to avoid it, but upon the facts stated both of the receivers of the national banks are charged with malfeasance and with not doing their duty; and one part of the complaint is that the Comptroller of Currency has refused in the case of the Ocean Bank to confirm sales made which the parties charge were fraudulent. The investigation relates only to the action of the receiver. But as to the other bank it is charged that the Comptroller is not exercising that discretion which the law gives him, either in ordering prosecutions and suits against those charged with having swallowed up all the assets of the German National Bank of Chicago——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Is the receiver an officer of the Government or of the courts?

Mr. BUCKNER. He is an officer under the Comptroller of the Currency.

The SPEAKER. Under the law.

Mr. BUCKNER. Yes, under the law.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Are there any facts to be discovered by this committee which cannot be developed by proper proceedings in the United States courts against the receivers? I understand that there is an allegation of malfeasance.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand that the Comptroller of the Currency has power to authorize an investigation or proceedings in the courts, and it is one of the complaints made here by these parties that the Comptroller has refused to look into these matters, refusing to authorize proceedings.

Mr. WHITE. I understand from the statement of the gentleman from Missouri that there is an allegation of malfeasance and misappropriation of funds and a failure to perform properly his duties in the sale of real estate. I submit that under the laws of the country the courts, by proper proceedings, have jurisdiction of the matter.

Mr. CALKINS. The Comptroller of the Currency is the person to be investigated.

Mr. WHITE. Has he been investigated about this matter? I do not care about it much, but I do not want that we shall go upon a fool's errand here.

Mr. McLANE. I desire one explanation from the gentleman from Missouri. I understand distinctly that this question of the receiver in the first instance is a judicial question, although the receiver is appointed by the Comptroller of the Currency. I understand that all questions can be referred to the courts. I am not willing to interfere until the case has gone beyond its present status. That is the point to which I direct my inquiry, which is, if the Comptroller of the Currency and receiver are not doing their duty, then I will admit that it becomes a political question. That is the point to which I direct my inquiry.

Mr. BUCKNER. I would say to the gentleman from Maryland that the petition states that the receiver or the Comptroller is acting improperly, and therefore they directed an investigation.

Mr. WHITE. Has the committee called the Comptroller of the Currency before them?

Mr. BUCKNER. They have not.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, on the statement of the gentleman from Missouri I withdraw my objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BUCKNER. I now call the previous question.

The question being put upon seconding the previous question, there were, on division—ayes 101, noes 46.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put, being upon the adoption of the resolution; and being put, there were—ayes 104, noes 47.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I say one word of suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER?] As a matter of justice to a public officer who has served the country many years faithfully, I ask that Mr. Knox be asked to come before the committee for half an hour to see if he can explain the situation, and if he cannot then we can go on with the investigation.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 130, nays 63, not voting 93; as follows:

Mr. HENDERSON. My colleague, Mr. FORT, is paired on political questions with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MILLS.

Mr. COFFROTH. My colleague, Mr. BACHMAN, is paired with the gentleman from Colorado, Mr. BELFORD.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My colleague, Mr. RICHMOND, is detained at his room by sickness. He is paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. NEWBERRY.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—WITHDRAWAL OF VOTES.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that last week I arranged for a pair with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BAYNE,] to take effect on Monday last. On that day, forgetting the pair, I inadvertently voted upon three propositions—the tobacco tax, the Melbourne and Sydney exposition, and the motion for adjournment. I now ask leave, as it will not change the result, to withdraw my votes on those questions, as at the time I voted I was paired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia.) If there be no objection leave will be granted to the gentleman to withdraw his vote on the questions indicated.

There was no objection.

ROOM OF COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask leave to report the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to have the eastern lobby on the floor of the House furnished and fitted for the reception of visitors, and that the small room now occupied for that purpose be assigned to the use of the Committee on Appropriations, which by its increase in numbers requires additional accommodations, and that he be authorized to order and have made such alterations in the building as will conveniently connect said small room with the present Appropriations Committee room.

Mr. CONGER. Is that subject to objection?

The SPEAKER. This, as the Chair is advised, is a report heretofore made from the Committee on Appropriations, and recommitted.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir; it is a report made by the committee. I am directed by them to report the resolution to the House.

Mr. CONGER. This is not a privileged report, of course.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman desires to make that point of order, I can withdraw the report and get it in some other time probably. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. The arrangement proposed is absolutely necessary.

Mr. CONGER. My objection is to taking away from members the right of passing through the corridor behind the Speaker's chair, and also to closing——

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will allow me one moment——

Mr. CONGER. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman is mistaken in his supposition.

Mr. CONGER. And I also object to shutting off the end of the corridor for the purpose of making a connection between the two rooms mentioned and thus preventing the passage of the air from the outer window into the corridors. There must be room enough in this Capitol for the Committee on Appropriations to have some other two rooms joined; I wish they had four. It is said that they will put up a low screen in the corridor; but we know that the Committee on Appropriations are not going to occupy a room which is shut off from the corridor by a screen alone. This proposition means cutting off whatever air may pass into the corridor from the outer window. Members are dying here year by year for lack of ventilation. I object to anything which shall cut off one particle of the currents of air we now have through these corridors or in this Hall. That is the reason I object.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not think my friend is in any danger of dying from that cause. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. If I could rely on the gentleman's statement on that, as I am not often permitted to do on a good many things, I should be glad. [Laughter.]

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman will indicate, I will explain in regard to other matters quite as satisfactorily as I have done in reference to this.

Mr. CONGER. I will withhold my objection until after the gentleman has been heard.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman is as usual industrious in coming forward, and I commend him for his industry.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I object, if the gentleman is to occupy his time in insinuations against me. [Laughter.] The amiable gentleman from Ohio yesterday got into the RECORD a statement in regard to me unworthy of any gentleman of this House, a remark made by the gentleman from the Dayton district, [Mr. MCMAHON,] which I did not notice at the time. It is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ATKINS. I trust the gentleman will not make a serious matter of my remark.

Mr. CONGER. These personalities flow so spontaneously over there that I must object.

Mr. ATKINS. I will retract the remark, but notify the gentleman now that hereafter he must be more careful and not make any personal remarks when he speaks to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield any further to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. Then I make the point of order against this bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; it is too late to make it.

Mr. CONGER. I reserved it.

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; you did not reserve it.

Mr. CONGER. I did reserve it.

Mr. ATKINS. You did not.

Mr. CONGER. The RECORD will show that I did.

Mr. ATKINS. The RECORD will show no such thing. [Laughter.] The gentleman spoke of reserving it, but he did not reserve it.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of fact.

Mr. WHITE. He did reserve it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the RECORD to be read. It is a matter of fact to be decided by the RECORD.

Mr. CONGER. I did reserve objection, and so stated.

Mr. ATKINS. If the gentleman now says that he said that at the time I will yield.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will indulge me in a single remark. This resolution should be disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make my statement before he proceeds.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am only going to make a single statement. If it is to be changed, well and good; but if it is not to be changed, I hope we shall know it. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will not insist on his objection. Let us state the case, and if the majority of the House desires action in the adoption of the resolution, well and good.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing to withdraw the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his report.

Mr. CONGER. Let the reporters state what there is on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The report of the gentleman from Tennessee is withdrawn, and necessarily the point of order drops.

Mr. CONGER. I know it does, but there is a question of dispute between the gentleman and myself as to what I said in open House.

Mr. ATKINS. I state unreservedly and distinctly that I understood the gentleman to speak of reserving it, but he did not do it. That is my understanding of the remark, but I said to the gentleman if he says that he said differently I yield to his assertion.

The SPEAKER. Then there is no further controversy.

Mr. CONGER. I said that I had no objection to the gentleman's stating the object, reserving the point of order, and I have none now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. ATKINS. Have I not the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to withdraw his report.

Mr. ATKINS. But I have another report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman after he signs two enrolled bills.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1152) to extend the time for the payment of preemptors on certain public lands in the State of Minnesota and Territory of Dakota.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ATKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriations act, approved March 3, 1879, with amendments by the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. Is this a report from the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER. It is a report from the Committee on Appropriations of a House joint resolution with Senate amendments. The amendments of the Senate will now be read.

Mr. CONGER. Let them be read subject to points of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. After line 12 insert:

That the paragraph in said act relating to the extension of the military telegraph lines from Fort Buford to Helena, Dakota Territory, be amended so as to read as follows, namely: "For the extension of the military lines to Helena, Montana Territory, and the new post on the Milk River, and such other points as may be necessary, $20,000."

2. After line 12 insert:

That the paragraph in said act relating to the extension of the military telegraph lines from Fort Elliott, Texas, westward, be amended so as to read as follows, namely: "For the extension of the military telegraph lines to Fort Elliott, Texas, and westward, as may be necessary, $20,000."

3. After line 12 insert:

That the following paragraph in said act, namely, "That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and empowered to lease the water-power at Moline or such portion as may be agreed upon to the Moline Water-Power Company, upon such terms and conditions, and for such term of years as may be agreed upon, if the same can be done consistently with the interests of the Government of the United States; said lease to be made upon the condition that the said Moline Water-Power Company shall go on and complete the development of the water power and maintain it at its own cost and expense," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

4. After line 12 insert:

That in the final settlement of the accounts of Henry C. De Ahna, late collector of customs at Sitka, Alaska, the proper accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow and pay to the said De Ahna the further sum of $2,000, in full compensation and final discharge for all expenses incurred and losses sustained by said De Ahna in traveling to and from Alaska, and in obtaining and furnishing the Treasury Department with reports concerning the condition of public affairs in said Territory. And said sum of $2,000 is for that purpose hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

5. Amend the title so as to read as follows:

Joint resolution to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriations act, approved March 3, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the report of the committee be now read. The committee recommend concurrence in the Senate amendments, with other amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriations act, approved March 3, 1879, together with the amendments of the Senate thereto, having considered the same, beg leave to report as follows:

They recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered, 1, 2, 3, and 5.

They recommend concurrence in the amendment numbered 4, with amendments, as follows:

Add at the end of said Senate amendments, as new paragraphs, these words:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes, namely:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

To pay the widow and heirs of Hon. Rush Clark, deceased, to be distributed in the proportion prescribed by the law of descent of the State of Iowa, $9,235.50.

To pay the widow of Hon. Gustave Schleicher, deceased, one year's salary, a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated.

To pay John C. Kondrup, messenger of reporters of debates, House of Representatives, for the present session, at the rate of $83.33 per month, a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated.

WAR DEPARTMENT.

For deficiency in the appropriation for pay of cadets at the Military Academy for the current fiscal year, $7,500.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

That the sum of $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay adjusted accounts for service or expenses incurred in completing the eighth census.

That the sum of $4,090.69 is hereby appropriated to pay adjusted accounts for service or expenses incurred in completing the ninth census.

To pay Semmes & Barbour, or their legal representatives, as recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, this amount in full satisfaction for their claim for rent of buildings for the use of the Pension Office, on Louisiana avenue and C street northwest, known as the Seaton House, and the building adjoining it on the west, known as Nos. 624, 626, and 628 Louisiana avenue, and Nos. 619, 621, and 623 C street, and for damage to the said buildings sustained while occupied by the Government, and also in full satisfaction for rent for and damages to said buildings subsequent to September 15, 1876, $9,316.94, to be paid out of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the contingent fund of the Pension Office for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1877.

That the second clause under the heading "Geological Survey," in the act of March 3, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," is hereby amended by adding at the end of the said clause the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. ATKINS. I do not know that it is necessary for me to enter into an explanation of the different items in these amendments. If it is deemed desirable by any members of the House, I will do so. We recommend concurrence in the Senate amendments. I will run over them very briefly. They were principally verbal, correcting some mistakes in regard to telegraph lines in the western territory.

The principal item of the Senate amendments, Mr. Speaker, is the repeal of a clause in the last sundry civil act which authorized and empowered the Secretary of War—

To lease the water-power at Moline, or such portion of it as may be agreed upon, to the Moline Water-Power Company upon such terms and conditions, and for such term of years as may be agreed upon, if the same can be done consistently with the interests of the Government of the United States.

This is a proposition to repeal that clause in the sundry civil act which authorized the Secretary of War to lease that power to the Moline Water-Power Company at Rock Island, Illinois. There has been expended at Rock Island between five and six millions of dollars, and it will require about $157,000 to carry out the obligation that the United States in 1867 assumed to improve the water-power. The Government in that year assumed the obligation to improve the water-power at its own cost and to give to the Moline Water-Power Company the use of one-half of the power. The Government has expended nearly $800,000—the exact amount is $758,000—in improving that water-power. The report of the Army engineer shows that it will require $157,000 still to complete the improvements of the water-power in the way they ought to be completed. For the last four years Congress has refused to make any appropriation for this purpose, and the work stands there uncompleted. In that condition of affairs the company ask that Congress should lease to them the water-power that they may utilize it and improve it. At the last session of Congress we authorized the Secretary of War to do so. He refuses to do so because he does not believe it is in conformity with the interests of the United States.

Now, then, we propose simply by this clause to repeal the law authorizing the Secretary of War to lease that water-power to the Moline Water-Power Company. It will hereafter be a question for Congress to decide what it will do with the Moline water-power—whether it will make the necessary appropriations to complete the improvement, or go on as it has done for four years, making no appropriation and letting it remain as it is.

There are several appropriations made in this amendment. One is to pay the claim of Semmes & Barbour for the occupation of and damage done to the building called the Seaton building, amounting to some $9,000. It has been adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and no doubt it is correct.

There is also an appropriation of $7,500 for the pay of cadets, not enough having been appropriated for this year.

There is also an appropriation of one year's salary to the widow and heirs of Hon. Rush Clark, late a member of this House from the State of Iowa; and, Mr. Speaker, at the instance of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,]—if I may allude to it—who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, an appropriation is recommended for the widow of Hon. Gustave Schleicher, who was a member-elect to this House, but was never sworn in, having died before the term began.

There is also an appropriation of $9,000 to pay some marshals and deputy marshals for taking the eighth census. Why they have not been paid I do not know. I am frank to state that of the fifty-seven all except seven are from the Southern States. The Secretary of the Interior recommends that they be paid, and the Committee on Appropriations have agreed to do so.

There are also some eight or ten marshals and deputy marshals, or census takers, for the ninth census who have not been paid; but there is an appropriation to pay them. I believe these are the principal points of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to amend by adding the following paragraph:

SEC. —. That there shall be paid to the retired officers of the Army, who have not received their pay according to the rank on which they were originally retired, since March 3, 1875, the difference of pay between the amount actually paid them and their pay as fixed by law on the rank on which they were so retired; and hereafter they shall be borne on the retired list, with rank and pay as originally retired.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Is that in order now?

Mr. HAWLEY. Allow me to make a statement.

Mr. ATKINS. Before the gentleman proceeds, allow me to say that I made a mistake in my statement. I should have said that the appropriation was for the widow and heirs of the late Mr. Schleicher.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTON. I notice by the report of the Committee on Appropriations that the sum of $9,000 is appropriated to pay the salary which would have been due to Mr. Rush Clark if he had lived during his term, while only $5,000, or one year's pay, is given to the heirs of Mr. Schleicher. Now if it is right to pay either gentleman for a term during which they did not serve, then we ought to pay them both equal, and I suggest to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] that he put the families of these two deceased members on the same footing.

I understand that the ground of difference is that Mr. Rush Clark was sworn in and Mr. Schleicher was not; but the House will recollect that for the time in this Congress that Mr. Rush Clark served he was paid, and therefore it seems to me that the unexpired term of Mr. Clark and the whole of the term of Mr. Schleicher should stand upon the same footing. If either is paid for the full term it seems to me that both should be.

Mr. ATKINS. This matter is a delicate matter, and so far as I am concerned I do not know that I should have any objection; but there never has been an instance where an appropriation was made for the family of a member who died before he was sworn in, and if it should be done in this case it would be the first instance. It has been usual for the last few years to give the residue of the salary to the widows and heirs of deceased members.

It is true that Mr. Clark died very early in his service, but that does not alter the principle. Now, I would say to my honorable friend that while I have as much sympathy for the family of Mr. Schleicher and as much admiration for that gentleman's career upon this floor as any member here, I think we should not set a precedent of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the last House recommended the payment of a reasonable sum of money to the heirs of Mr. Schleicher.

Mr. ATKINS. I would not stand here a moment to interpose an objection, if it be the will of the House to vote this money.

Mr. COX. I introduced that resolution which was adopted, and the Speaker thought it was the direction of the last House, and I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will make no opposition to this amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say this: I understand that the families of these two deceased members have been left by their death in circumstances where at least the sympathy of the House should be extended to them. I can see no difference of principle in the two cases. The mere fact of a few days earlier or a few days later attendance in this House does not constitute any practical difference. The circumstances in which the families are left by the death of the late members of this House place them both in a situation where such an appropriation as is here proposed is at least in accordance with precedents from the very beginning of this Government. I hope the amendment will be made in this case.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection at all, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to amend so that the sum of $10,000 shall be appropriated for the widow and heirs of Hon. Gustave Schleicher. I am informed by the Senator from Maine, who formerly presided over this House, that the distinction is this: where a member-elect has never appeared in this House, it has not been customary to pay anything to the family; but where the member-elect to one House has appeared and taken his seat as a member of a preceding House, and died before taking the oath of office in the subsequent House to which he was elected, it has been usual to pay to the family the salary for the whole term. I am informed that there are precedents on record to that effect.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Will my friend from Virginia answer a question?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Was not the salary of the Representative from Texas as a member of the Forty-fifth Congress voted to him by that Congress?

Mr. REAGAN. For the short remainder of the session.

The SPEAKER. He died very near the end of his term in that Congress.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Ungracious as it may appear, I must align myself with those who are opposed to this proposition. Here was a member whose family was paid for his term as a member of the Forty-fifth Congress. He never was admitted into the Forty-sixth Congress. By the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] it is proposed to give $10,000 to his heirs at law. That is the salary for the entire term of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Now, I can call to mind one, two, or three instances in the State of Tennessee where men were elected, I believe to the Forty-fifth Congress, or if not to that Congress then to the Forty-fourth Congress, and who died before the commencement of their term. Their families stand in precisely the same condition as the family of the gentleman from Texas; that is to say, if they were poverty-stricken. Those members-elect were never inducted into office.

Now, gentlemen, you should be careful that you do not set what may be a dangerous precedent. What merit is there in this case? If there is any merit, then the undistinguished man who never has been here in Congress and who never has drawn anything from the public Treasury has the advantage, if there is any advantage in that aspect of the question. There is no telling where a precedent of this kind once established will lead. We have no right to take the money of the people and give it as a mere gratuity or charity to any one. Our action here should be based in that respect on the question of consideration or service rendered.

Mr. HAWLEY. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] in a wholesome jealousy of all precedents for future action in the expenditures of money. But I do not agree with him in saying that Mr. Schleicher had rendered no service or made no sacrifice which would justify this appropriation. Very often there is imposed upon a member a very serious sacrifice of private business and very great labor in accepting a place here in this House.

I think the general sense of equity of the American people would justify us in ordering in such cases a reasonable appropriation to be paid to the family. It is just as equitable, whether technically as correct or not, as was the appropriation of the money given to Mr. Clark, of Iowa, who served but a month in this Congress. It is proposed to give Mr. Clark's estate the sum of $9,000, or the remainder of the salary for this Congress. I am perfectly willing to do it, and I am sure I have not a constituent who will grumble at me for doing it.

This was proposed or rather suggested in the Committee on Appropriations as a future rule, that there should be a statute providing that in the case of the death of a member during his term or after he shall have been returned as elected to Congress, the sum of $5,000 shall be paid to his family. It is proposed that that shall be the general rule. If a man dies within a month of the end of his term, of course it may be said that his family would have a little advantage, and if he dies near the beginning of his term it might be said that the family would in that case realize a disadvantage, so far as the salary was concerned. On the whole, however, it will work equitably and save us from discussions and wrangling about equity in each case, and in the long run will operate as a fair rule. I hope the House will not refuse the appropriation for the family of Mr. Schleicher, and I am content to leave it at the present figure.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in the Senate amendments with sundry amendments.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand there is no motion before the House except the report of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Tennessee to oppose the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations as to an amendment to a Senate amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I oppose that; yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. What is that amendment to the Senate amendment?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I oppose voting the salary; and I raise the point of order upon the proposed amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I neglected to state to the House that there is also a proposition in this joint resolution, by way of amendment, to make available at once, instead of at the beginning of the next fiscal year, the sum of $100,000 appropriated for the Geological Bureau.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg leave to renew my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit to the House the amendments of the Senate in their order. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, and 5.

Mr. REAGAN. I want to make a suggestion; I do not know whether this is the proper time to do it. I desire to suggest that in making the appropriation for the benefit of Mr. Schleicher's family, consisting of his widow and children, that the appropriation had better be made payable to the widow.

Mr. WHITE. I call for the reading of the amendments in which the committee recommend concurrence.

The first, second, third, and fifth amendments of the Senate were then read and concurred in.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on concurring in the fourth amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence with amendments, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the fourth amendment of the Senate by adding as new paragraphs the following:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the following purposes, to wit:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

To pay the widow and heirs of Hon. Rush Clark, deceased, to be distributed in the proportion prescribed by the law of descent of the State of Iowa, $9,235.50.

To pay the widow of Hon. Gustave Schleicher, deceased, one year's salary, a sufficient sum is hereby appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the last paragraph of the amendments of the committee and insert the following:

To pay the widow of Hon. Gustave Schleicher, deceased, two years' salary, $10,000; which sum is hereby appropriated.

The amendment of Mr. HUNTON to the amendments of the committee was agreed to; there being ayes 107, noes not counted.

Mr. BENNETT. I move to amend the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations by adding the following:

For salary of an additional associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Dakota, appointed under act of Congress approved March 3, 1879, from the date of his appointment to the 30th day of June, 1879, the sum of $680, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. ATKINS. There is no objection to that amendment.

Mr. CLYMER. Is not that included in the legislative bill?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; the legislative bill includes the salary for next year; this is the salary for the present year.

The amendment of Mr. BENNETT was adopted.

Mr. HAWLEY. I now beg to renew the amendment I indicated a while ago.

Mr. WHITE. I reserve a point of order until I hear the proposition explained.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I have already reserved a point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] made a point of order, but kindly consented to reserve it until I had made my statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves a point of order on the amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. That there shall be paid to the retired officers of the Army who have not received their pay according to the rank on which they were originally retired since March 3, 1875, the difference of pay between the amount actually paid them and their pay as fixed by law on the rank on which they were so retired; and hereafter they shall be borne on the retired list with the rank and pay as originally retired.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, this practically comes from the committee as much as if it were a part of the bill, because it was in the hands of a sub-committee at the time the report was adopted, and another meeting of the main committee was expected. The sub-committee are unanimously in favor of it; the chairman and various other members agree to it, and none object so far as I know. But it was agreed on too late to be incorporated in the bill. I have the sanction of the chairman of the committee in offering the amendment now. I proceed to state the reason for the amendment; and if gentlemen will hear me I think they will waive all objection to it.

By an act passed in 1866 it was provided that officers who were retired should be retired upon the rank of the actual command held by them at the time of receiving the disabling wound. That act went into effect; and under it some two hundred and eighty-one officers were retired from time to time—many of them with disabling wounds, all of them severely wounded. They all received the pay of the command actually held by them. For instance, in one case there was an officer who during nearly the whole of the war had been a colonel commanding a brigade; and he received a very severe wound while holding such command. Now there was an equity in favor of allowing a man who commanded a brigade the pay of a brigadier-general; but such officers received only the pay of the lower commission which they held. When discussion arose upon the act of 1866 it was decided to be a just and equitable rule that an officer retired for disability should receive the pay of the command he held. For example, Thomas J. Wood, well known to many men here as one who served during the Mexican war and made an honorable record in the war of the rebellion, commanded for a long time a division, a major-general's command, although he was only a brigadier-general. Under this law, upon being retired, he received a major-general's pay.

So they ran on down to second lieutenants who were holding first lieutenant's or captain's command, performing all the duties, undergoing all the responsibilities, and incurring all the risks of that command. They were retired accordingly to the number of about two hundred and eighty-one, I think.

Now, sir, there came up in 1875 a bill to add to the list of retired officers a gentleman from the State of Pennsylvania. There was a good deal of argument and dispute about it in both Houses, but the bill passed, a personal bill for his relief only. There was a second section added to that bill in these words:

SEC. 2. That all officers of the Army who have been heretofore retired by reason of disability arising from wounds received in action shall be considered as retired upon the actual rank held by them, whether in the regular or volunteer service, at the time when such wound was received, and shall be borne on the retired list and receive pay hereafter accordingly; and this section shall be taken and construed to include those now borne on the retired list placed upon it on account of wounds received in action.

The words "of the command" were omitted in that second section; I suppose intentionally so. It worked a great injustice. If after the words "of the actual rank" the words of the act of 1866, "of the command," had been retained, it would have made no change.

As I have already stated, this was a bill for the relief of one officer, but by the omission of those words it worked injustice to twenty-one officers who had been for nine years receiving the pay of the rank of the command held by them at the time they were wounded. It struck down twenty-one officers who had been virtually, I may say, under a contract with the Government; who had accepted this retirement on the pay they had been for nine years receiving. Those twenty-one officers were struck down a grade or two grades in their pay simply by this section added to a private bill for the relief of one man only. Whether a mistake or not, the injustice was the same.

Now, of that twenty-one, one man has died and nine or ten men have been restored to the pay they had formerly received for nine years, by special act, or by a revision by the War Department; but largely by special acts of Congress. So there are now remaining only eleven men who are receiving pay less than that which Congress gave them and they enjoyed for nine years. I say there is no justice whatever in it. Instead of being—I will not say annoyed, but I will say instead of having to undergo the labor of listening to eleven individual applications, why not let us correct the injustice as to all at once?

Here is a letter from the Secretary of War, dated May 14, 1879: "The legislation asked for is respectfully recommended." The amendment I submit is the one recommended in this communication from the War Department to correct this error.

I will read an extract from a letter of General E. D. Townsend, Adjutant-General United States Army, dated April 11, 1879:

The restoration of these officers to their original grade on the retired list seems just and proper.

They earned by service, wounds, &c., the position they held under laws existing at the time, and actually held the rank and exercised the corresponding command when they were wounded. This was only a suitable reward for services rendered, which was given by the President, on the report of an examining board. They accepted their grade of retirement under these laws without any idea that it would be changed and made their arrangements for living accordingly. The reduction, therefore, inflicted, on some of them especially, great hardships, when their disabled condition prevented their engaging in other occupations.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. McMILLIN. Those colonels who were in command of brigades, did they by law before they were wounded draw a colonel's pay or a general's pay?

Mr. HAWLEY. I explained that once, but perhaps not clearly, and I will do it again. There was an equity always existing in cases of that sort. A man holding for months and years the command of a brigade—and many of us had that sort of experience—was involved in heavy additional expense, and he ought to have received a brigadier-general's pay, but he never got it.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is what I wish to know.

Mr. HAWLEY. And I wish to satisfy the gentleman on that point. When Congress came deliberately to provide for the retired list it did provide a remedy. They said if a man was a captain holding the position of a lieutenant-colonel or of a colonel in command of his regiment, or a colonel who held a brigade command, he should be retired and receive the pay of the rank the duties of which he was performing at the time he was wounded.

I put it upon this ground: whatever the original equity, and that is indisputable, I put this amendment on the ground that the Government deliberately settled this thing once and led these men who might possibly have gone into civil life and adopted some other way of getting along—led them to expect, I will not say this bounty, but this justice, upon going on the retired list, and after nine years, by what I insist was a mistake in a section of a private bill, reduced them to a lower grade.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Before the gentleman finishes his statement will he say how much money is involved in this?

Mr. HAWLEY. There have been about four years of suspension in the cases of these ten or eleven. I asked one of them, a brigadier-general, that question; and he figured upon it and said it would take about $18,000 to pay the balances withheld during the last four years, and after this $4,000 a year.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I now renew my point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg the gentleman rather to make an argument against the amendment if he can, and then let the House vote upon it. It is practically a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Just one word as to my object in making the point of order. I do not pretend the intimations that I have had are correct, but the intimation made to me by a gentleman upon the Military Committee is that gross wrong and injustice will be done by the passage of this proposition, and that a large amount of money is involved in it. And then beyond that I have been told, my mind having been directed to an examination of the retired list in another branch of the public service, that very gross inequality and injustice has been done and is being perpetrated in the retired list of the Army. Now, I do not assume that that is correct. I do assume, however, that the proposition should not come in here at this moment and in this manner without a sufficient opportunity of examination and investigation, without even the Committee on Appropriations having investigated the subject.

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman will pardon me. That is a mistake. A sub-committee of the Appropriations Committee has investigated this subject.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The sub-committee only has done so.

Mr. HAWLEY. And the committee approves the conclusion which the sub-committee arrived at.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. We know how hurriedly these things are done. I now ask the House to pause. I submit the inquiry to every gentleman, if the House votes on this proposition does the House know what it is doing? Does it know how much cost it involves? Does it know where this is to reach? Does it know the full meaning of it?

But I am addressing the Chair on a question of order. I have been by my experience in this House reminded how revolutionary and how vicious it is to put riders upon bills; riders that the country and the House have had full opportunity of investigating and understanding. Now, here in the last moment, as the House is about dispersing, when the drum is on the tap, it is proposed to mount a rider, put him on this bill and send him to take money out of the Treasury.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to reply for a moment to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. WHITE. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will state what is his point of order.

Mr. WHITE. I submit this bill should go before the Committee on Military Affairs, which had the subject under consideration in the last Congress.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will waive the point of order for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear what the point of order is.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will state my point of order. In the first place, the bill has passed all through its parliamentary stages. It is now pending in this House upon the report of a committee on the matter of difference between the two Houses. That is the question really before the House; and if my attention had been directed to it in time I would have made the point of order to the recommendation of the committee, because their amendment should have been germane to the amendment made by the Senate to the bill of the House. The Senate having concurred in the original proposition of the House with an amendment, that amendment comes back to the House; and that amendment forms the whole question before the House, and nothing is in order except what is germane to the amendment made by the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, upon the point of order I submit that in equity that has been waived altogether, and it is rather late to make the point of order when the House has permitted the Committee on Appropriations virtually to make a new bill.

Mr. WHITE rose.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to wait a moment.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to reserve the point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I was about to argue the point of order and at the same time, like the gentleman from Tennessee, to make a gentle insinuation as to the merits of the case. The gentleman from Tennessee says we do not know how far this goes and how much money it will cost. I am satisfied it refers only to eleven men; for I have the certificate of the War Department to that effect; and my amendment is drawn by one of the ablest lawyers ever in the Cabinet, the Secretary of War, whose ability as a jurist is now about to be tested elsewhere. I am perfectly willing to trust him; and I know enough of this case from the War Department, from lawyers, and from officers to be able to assure the gentleman from Tennessee, with perfect confidence, that this affects only eleven men who have been unjustly reduced in rank and pay.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to submit an additional remark on the point of order.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a point of order. I make the point of order that this amendment is obnoxious to Rule 112. It makes an appropriation, and should receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole House. I will add the additional point of order that there is a bill already pending for this purpose, and it is not in order to offer that bill as an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I was going to add that the amendment changes the existing law, and is not in the interest of economy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point that this is adding new matter to an appropriation bill which has passed both Houses, and which is not germane to any part of the bill as it has passed either House, is a valid objection; and the Chair would state, with the utmost respect, that the committees of this House hardly have the right to add new matter to a bill in controversy between the two Houses in this way. The Chair therefore, governed by the principle and by the letter of the rule to which reference has been made, sustains the point that entirely new matter cannot be injected into an appropriation bill in this way without being subjected to the rule that it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order; and if the point of order had been made he would have sustained it as to other new matter which has been inserted in the bill. The House cannot well restrict the Senate in amending a bill through the House rules, because they are inoperative there. The House should not and cannot properly, in the opinion of the Chair, evade and escape the terms of its own rules in this way, if objection is made to insertion of legislation absolutely new.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendments which are now pending are those which are pending between the two Houses.

The SPEAKER. This amendment is not germane to anything in the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. We can only put in amendments to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The House has now disposed of everything in controversy between the two Houses.

The following amendment, recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, was read:

Interior Department:

That the sum of $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to pay adjudicated accounts for services and expenses incurred in completing the eighth census; and $4,090.69 is hereby appropriated to pay adjudicated accounts for services or expenses incurred in completing the ninth census.

Mr. SAMFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman why it is that these payments were not made before?

Mr. ATKINS. It is utterly impossible for me to answer that question.

Mr. SAMFORD. The claims seem to have accrued ten or fifteen years ago.

Mr. ATKINS. I can only say that they have not been paid. Many of these claims come from the South, and some of them from the gentleman's own State.

Mr. SAMFORD. That would make no difference to me unless the claims were just. These claims appear to be ten or twelve years old.

Mr. ATKINS. One of them is nineteen years old.

Mr. SAMFORD. We ought to have some reason given why they have not been paid before.

Mr. ATKINS. The reason is simply that they have not been paid.

Mr. CLYMER. There was a sum appropriated to pay them, but the money was not called for, and was covered into the Treasury.

Mr. ATKINS. There was a proposition to pay them out of the unexpended balance for the expenses of the eighth census, but instead of the "eighth" the word "ninth" was inserted, and there was no unexpended balance out of which to pay them. I will state that two years ago an attempt was made to pay these claims, and they would have been paid but for a mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

The remaining amendments recommended by the Committee on Appropriations were read and agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the various votes taken upon the Senate amendments; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a resolution (in which the concurrence of the House was requested) directing the Public Printer to deliver to the Secretary of the Interior ten copies of the Colonial Charters and Constitutions of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 572) to amend an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places of holding courts in said districts."

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan; and

An act (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes.

ADDITIONAL ROOM FOR THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ATKINS. I understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] withdraws his point of order upon the resolution which I offered some time since, and I now ask leave to submit it again.

Mr. McMILLIN. I reserve the right to make a point of order upon it after it is read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to have the eastern lobby of the floor of the House furnished and fitted for the reception of visitors; that the small room now occupied for that purpose be assigned to the use of the Committee on Appropriations, which by its increase in numbers requires additional accommodations; and that he be authorized to order and have made such alterations in the building as will conveniently connect said small room with the present Appropriations Committee room.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the introduction of that resolution.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] informed me that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] withdrew his objection.

Mr. CONGER. Then the gentleman from Ohio referred to one thing and I referred to another. As I understood it, it was in regard to a bill.

Mr. ATKINS. I understood the gentleman to make his point of order on this resolution.

Mr. CONGER. This is the resolution in regard to the room for the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ATKINS. It is.

Mr. CONGER. Then I objected to that, and I had not intended to withdraw that objection. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] must have misunderstood me, or else I misunderstood him. I will state this, that, reserving the point of order and objection to the resolution, I will not object to a statement being made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ATKINS. If the Chair will allow me to make the statement I will do so and be very brief.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to that, reserving the right to make the point of order.

Mr. ATKINS. The object of this resolution is to provide an additional room for the accommodation of the Committee on Appropriations. The room which that committee now occupies is too small, especially since the committee has been increased from eleven to fifteen members. Even if the room was not too small for the committee in its general sittings, it is absolutely essential that there be an additional room for the sub-committees to occupy while engaged in the consideration and preparation of the various appropriation bills. We cannot possibly get along in our small room with two or three sub-committees. That is the whole of it.

So far as the cutting off the end of the corridor is concerned, if gentlemen object to that, so far as I am concerned I am willing to waive that feature of the proposition. The only proposition, however, in regard to that matter was to put up some lattice work five or six feet high.

Gentlemen will readily understand that members of the Committee on Appropriations while maturing the appropriation bills are called from the room almost every moment by persons who desire to have this or that thing considered in an appropriation bill. The object of putting up that lattice-work is simply to provide a private means of communication from one committee-room to the other, not to obstruct the light or ventilation at all, because the lattice-work can be made so open as not to obstruct the light or air, while it gives the committee the desired privacy.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the condition of the matter which was referred to a special committee at the last session of Congress in reference to removing some of the interior walls back of the Speaker's chair, in the south end of the building?

Mr. ATKINS. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] I am authorized by the chairman of the Committee on Ventilation, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] to say that the committee concur in the object of this resolution.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. My colleague must be mistaken in that, for the proposition was before the Committee on Ventilation and was rejected by a unanimous vote, except that of the chairman.

Mr. ATKINS. I beg to say that my colleague does not seem to have heard what I said. I simply stated that the chairman of the Committee on Ventilation, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. KIMMEL,] stated to me that the committee had no objection whatever to this reception-room being appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations, but that they did not propose to interfere with the order already made for a change in the southern part of the building, including the room now occupied by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the room occupied by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the room occupied by the official reporters of debates. I believe the reception-room alluded to in this resolution is not embraced at all in the contemplated alterations. Therefore my friend and colleague must be mistaken.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. No, I am not mistaken.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman if that room was contemplated in the proposed change?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. It was not.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well. Does the gentleman say that the Committee on Ventilation objected to the Committee on Appropriations having this small reception-room assigned to them?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes; I say that.

Mr. ATKINS. Then there is a palpable issue of fact between my colleague and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] and myself; and I do not think I am to blame. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to this discussion going further, provided it be understood that the point of order is reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the point of order to be that this report is not now in order, and can only be in order when committees are called.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope that the Speaker of the House, in the exercise of his official discretion, will assign to the Committee on Appropriations a suitable room in which they can transact the public business.

Mr. CONGER. It has been suggested that they be given this Hall. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always willing to accommodate committees in a matter of this kind; but the gentleman from Tennessee will bear in mind that this is a proposition to tear down a part of the wall of this building; and the Chair was not willing to order this to be done without authority from the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I was aware of the delicacy felt by the Chair in this matter.

The SPEAKER. But for this reason the Chair would have been glad to accommodate the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. Is a point of order made against the resolution?

Mr. CONGER. I am pleased to know that the Chair is unwilling to have the Capitol of the nation destroyed.

The SPEAKER. It never will be impaired with the consent of the present occupant of the chair.

Mr. CLYMER. The Architect of the Capitol assured the Committee on Appropriations that putting a door from the present reception room into the corridor so as to make a communication between that room and the present room of the Committee on Appropriations, would not be in any wise detrimental to the building but would be rather an improvement.

Mr. LORING. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Ventilation, I desire to make some remarks on this subject in order that gentlemen of this House who were not members of the last Congress may understand distinctly and thoroughly the bearings of this whole question. I am entirely in favor of accommodating the Committee on Appropriations, and I think such accommodation can be provided without interfering in any way with the arrangements which the last Congress made to ventilate this Hall for the benefit of the health of members.

It will be remembered that in the last House the Committee on Ventilation, assisted by the Capitol commission, made a careful and elaborate investigation into the ventilation of this Hall. Night after night was spent in endeavoring to ascertain the best method by which, in the arrangement of the Hall, the health of members could be promoted. It was found that the air of the House was so bad that in many instances members were unconsciously suffering and their health was being destroyed by the poisonous influence of the atmosphere here. Man after man, as we all know, fell in the service of his district here, stricken down by disease induced or actually created by the poisonous air of this room.

The importance of this question was thoroughly recognized in the last Congress, and as the result of very careful and elaborate investigation into the whole matter it was determined in the first place that the floor of this Hall should be perforated to correspond with the perforation of the ceiling, in order that the ingress and egress of the air might be thoroughly balanced. In the next place it was resolved that fire-places should be constructed in the rear of the Hall, not only for the purpose of radiant heat, but that we might also have the benefit of those flues and outlets in purifying the air.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. LORING. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think the gentleman has misconceived the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

Mr. LORING. I think I understand the resolution; but I desire to discuss this whole subject.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. This resolution contemplates only the use of the reception-room by the Committee on Appropriations. It does not interfere at all with the plan which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LORING] speaks of.

Mr. CLYMER. If necessary let a proviso be inserted that it shall not interfere with that plan.

Mr. CONGER. But the plan of the Committee on Ventilation contemplated the use of the reception-room by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. LORING. I will state the exact condition of affairs to the House; and if then any gentleman desires to modify or correct my statement I certainly shall have no objection.

The next step was to perforate the wall over the gallery on the south side of the House in order that there might be air and light there; for it was suddenly discovered that there was scarcely any air in that part of the gallery and that the beautiful ceiling and cornices were entirely invisible, because the light of heaven could not reach them, the upper corners of the Hall being more poorly provided with light than are the upper corners of a cellar in a modern house.

The next step in order to perfect the plan was to throw the whole area in the rear of the Speaker's chair into a large open room for the use of members, that room extending from the south wall of the House to the south wall of the Capitol. It was intended that by this improvement members should be furnished with a retiring room in which there would be sunlight and air, and where they could refresh themselves after suffering from the bad air of this Hall.

That plan was submitted in the first place to the Committee on Ventilation, and accepted by them. It was then submitted to the Capitol commission, and accepted by them. It was then brought before this House, and, after being clearly and distinctly stated, was by an overwhelming vote adopted. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, in order that the work might be perfected, added an amendment to the appropriation bill that $30,000 should be appropriated for the purpose of carrying out—what? Precisely the measures adopted by the House, and specified and drawn by the Architect of the Capitol.

In addition to that, sir, the House added to the standing Capitol commission a special commission; and although it may be invidious to name them, yet I will do so in order that gentlemen may understand the value the last House set upon this work. They named, in the first place, Mr. Hewitt, of New York, who more than twenty-five years has investigated and applied the best method of ventilating large halls. They added also Mr. Frank Jones, of New Hampshire, a gentleman of experience in all matters of building. They added, too, General Butler, then a member of this body, whose skill and experience in the general subject of ventilation are as well understood by this House as they are by the country at large and by the people of Massachusetts with whom he is so intimately connected. [Laughter.] And last, sir, I was added myself, simply, I doubt not, because I had manifested a thorough, sound, and healthy enthusiasm in this matter, in which I am happy to say I was sustained by the Speaker of the House, and by the Committee on Ventilation, who did me the honor to add me to their body as an honorary member.

Now, sir, that is the work which has been laid out, which has been accepted formally by the ventilation commission as at present organized, has been planned and estimated on by the architect, and which we hope and intend to accomplish. I desire to say, as a member of the present Committee on Ventilation, that I am entirely opposed to any alteration of the proposed arrangement. The room in the rear of this Hall, when completed according to the plan prepared by the architect himself and adopted by the last House, will be ample source of health to the members assembled here; not only on account of the room itself into which they can retire, but from the fact that when the doors on the south wall of this room are opened there will be an ingress of the pure air of heaven—not the air of a lobby tainted and damaged by the presence of a crowd, but clean, unqualified south-western breezes brought in here to give us air fit to breathe.

Now, that is all we have done, that is all we ask, and I trust and hope the Appropriations Committee will be accommodated elsewhere. There are large committee-rooms in the Capitol which, if that committee has been increased, will be provided for them, as I understand. Let us do everything, then, to accommodate the Committee on Appropriations, but do not let us interfere with any provision which has been made for the health and strength and comfort and moral condition of this House.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the objection to converting the old Hall of the House of Representatives into committee-rooms in which could be prepared a committee-room suitable for the Committee on Appropriations, together with other necessary committee-rooms? There is a large space now unoccupied, and why may not the Committee on Ventilation recommend some plan by which that hall could be converted into committee-rooms, making sixteen in all?

Mr. LORING. I see no objection to it at all. I am disposed to do almost anything in the world to accommodate the committees of the House, but I trust nothing will be done to interfere with the plan we have proposed for the ventilation of the Hall.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, evidently the gentleman from Massachusetts does not understand the purport of the resolution under consideration. It proposes in no way or in the least particular to interfere with the plan contemplated by himself and the Ventilation Committee. Indeed I do not think one member of the Committee on Appropriations would object to adding a proviso that it shall not interfere with the plan of the Committee on Ventilation.

The proposition is simply this: that the present reception-room shall have a door cut into it leading into the passage-way so we may go across from that little room into the main room of the Committee on Appropriations; and at the end of that corridor, in order to guard the committee from the influx of persons about the door, there shall be a screen from five to six feet high made of wood or iron, which cannot in any way interfere with the ventilation of the Hall. I make this statement because I feel this subject has been misunderstood in that regard.

It is a fact which is self-evident that in the single room now occupied by the Committee on Appropriations the large business of that committee cannot be satisfactorily transacted. In order that it may discharge its duty satisfactorily and thoroughly it must have greater accommodation, and that accommodation must be on this floor. We cannot be put up-stairs or down-stairs, for there is constant communication between the Appropriations Committee room and the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Is it proposed to turn the passage-way on the east side of the hall into the reception-room?

Mr. CLYMER. That is the proposition, that the east lobby shall be made the reception-room.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. How then can members pass around the hall? What becomes of the ventilation on that side of the House if that lobby is to be turned into a reception-room?

Mr. CLYMER. There has been no question in the minds of those who have examined the subject that when the reception-room has been transferred to the place indicated there will be ample room for the passage of persons on business on that side of the House. In the east lobby, where there is plenty of room for men and women, if necessary, which they seem to be, in the lobbies of the House, I think it would be altogether conducive to the morals, public and private, there should be a public place such as that for the reception of visitors.

Mr. LORING. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman. What is proposed to be done with the Sergeant-at-Arms's room if the reception room be occupied by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CLYMER. I have no suggestion to make as to that, except to say that the Sergeant-at-Arms requires but one room, and I do conceive upon this floor of the building there may be found a room for his accommodation; but there are no two rooms on this floor that we could take for the use of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that there are rooms all around this building, some of which could be joined by a door or a passage between them, making two communicating rooms in that way. Why not take two of those rooms, and not shut up the corridor?

Mr. CLYMER. Let me say in reply to the gentleman from Michigan, that if he is familiar with the plan of this floor he will understand that the only room unoccupied that could be used in connection with other rooms would be the room occupied by the Committee on Naval Affairs or the room occupied by the Committee on Military Affairs. The room occupied by the Committee on Military Affairs has no room adjoining it that could be connected with it by a door. To take the room occupied by the Committee on Naval Affairs would throw us right into the apartments occupied by the Clerk and where expensive arrangements have been made for the preservation of the files of the House.

Mr. CONGER. The room referred to, as I understand, is occupied only as a storeroom.

Mr. CLYMER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. That room has been fitted up for files and documents; and the Clerk has given us the assurance that with the number of officers employed by him and the amount of business he has to transact he cannot get along with less room than he has.

Mr. LORING. I suppose the gentleman understands that the reception-room, a convenient and comfortable room, is the room now suggested by the commissioners for the Sergeant-at-Arms; and the room now occupied by the Sergeant-at-Arms was to be thrown into the hall made by the removal of the wall in the rear of the Speaker's desk. Now will the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggest any other disposition that can be made of the Sergeant-at-Arms, so that the room he now occupies could be disposed of as I have stated?

Mr. CLYMER. In reply to the gentleman I will say, I understand very well that is the idea of the commission, but it is not a part of their duty under the law to assign a place for the Sergeant-at-Arms. The Clerk of the House would not yield more than one of his rooms, if he would do that. If he could give up one of his rooms that is now occupied by him as his private office it could be used by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I do not say this should be done; and I do say we should not take possession of any rooms occupied by the Clerk which he finds necessary for the performance of his duties.

Mr. LORING. There is no such proposition to interfere with the Clerk. But the House voted to clear away these walls.

Mr. CLYMER. But the House did not vote to take away the room occupied as a reception-room, nor the room occupied by the reporters.

Mr. LORING. The whole matter was discussed by the commission, and I state what was the result.

Mr. CLYMER. The commission does not propose to remove more than three rooms back of the Speaker's desk; the one at present occupied by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the room occupied by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the reporters' room. Now, there is a necessity for accommodations for the Committee on Appropriations. I suppose that is an admitted fact. The question is how those accommodations are to be provided.

Mr. LORING. I state distinctly that I join heartily with the gentleman in that object; but I do not want it carried out in such a way as to interfere with the plan of ventilation.

Mr. CLYMER. Does that interfere with the plan of ventilation?

Mr. LORING. Certainly; it cuts off so much fresh air.

Mr. CLYMER. We do not propose to interfere with those three rooms. We propose to take only the reception-room. We do not interfere at all with the room now occupied by the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. LORING. I desire that the assurance shall be given by this House and by the commissioners of the Capitol that nothing shall be done to interfere with the plan for which the last Congress appropriated $30,000.

Mr. CLYMER. I propose to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other gentleman, to offer a proviso that this shall not interfere with the plan of ventilation, only I do not wish it to be considered that the commissioners in submitting their plan shall say where the Sergeant-at-Arms shall have his room.

Mr. LORING. I suggest that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] withdraw his resolution and present it so modified as to have this understood.

Mr. ATKINS. I am willing to accept the modification.

Mr. LORING. I do not propose to draw out the modification at this moment. Let time be taken to draw it so that we can all understand it. A little delay can do no harm.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] proposes to add a proviso which will meet the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts precisely and exclude the possibility of our interfering with the plans of the Committee on Ventilation.

Mr. LORING. Why not let it rest a day till the modification can be properly drawn?

Mr. CLYMER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will listen to the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee I think he will be satisfied.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not been mingling in this discussion, but I want to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the resolution, that it ought to be a joint resolution. I do not believe that the House has a right to cut a hole through the walls of this building. Nothing short of a law would authorize it to be done. This building is national property, and nothing but the law can authorize the making of any other than the most ordinary changes. I suppose we could by a resolution of the House change the arrangement of our desks, but when it comes to cutting a hole through the wall, or enlarging the building, I think it amounts to such a change, that it should be authorized by a joint resolution.

No doubt the Senate would concur in any reasonable change that might be proposed by the House, but I, for one, would not like to consent that the Senate should cut a hole through their wall. When the elevator was put up in the Senate wing of the building it had to be authorized by a law.

Mr. LORING. There is a clause in the appropriation bill, inserted by the Appropriations Committee in the Senate, providing for the expenditure of money for this specific purpose, and stating definitely for what purpose.

Mr. GARFIELD. That would be a law of course, but here is a resolution of the House proposing to change the construction of the building.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the resolution.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I want to correct a statement I made awhile ago. When I first heard the resolution of my colleague read I was under the impression that it was the identical one which had been submitted to the Committee on Ventilation a few days ago. I stated that it was rejected by the committee, but upon an examination, I see that it is different from the resolution acted on by the committee.

ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 491) in relation to the accounts of the United States entomological commission.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the accounts of the salaries and disbursement of the United States entomological commission may be settled and allowed in the same manner and with the same effect as if the members and officers thereof had taken the oath required by law at the time they entered upon the performance of their duties: Provided, They shall have taken said oaths before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1879.

Mr. KNOTT. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, which fully explains the object and necessity of this bill.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, April 22, 1879.

SIR: Under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1877, making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, this Department appointed a commission of three entomologists to report upon the depredations of the Rocky Mountain locusts, &c. This commission, known as the United States entomological commission, entered upon its duties in March, 1877, appointing one of its members, Professor Cyrus Thomas, of Illinois, as disbursing agent, whose official bond as such disbursing agent was duly approved by this Department and filed with the Treasury Department. Owing to an oversight, however, the members of said commission failed to file the oath of office prescribed until after the close of the first year's labor. The Treasury Department has suspended the accounts of said Cyrus Thomas, disbursing agent, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, by reason of the omission to file the oath as abovementioned.

I have the honor to request that such legislation may be had as shall cause the accounting officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of said Cyrus Thomas all payments and disbursements which were honestly and faithfully made by him while acting as such disbursing officer, notwithstanding the failure of himself and associates to file the oath of office as members of said entomological commission.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. SCHURZ, Secretary.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VISITORS AT WEST POINT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that he is informed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] who was appointed Visitor at West Point, of his inability to attend to such service, and the Chair appoints Mr. MCLANE, of Maryland, in his stead.

IMPEACHMENT OF HON. GEORGE F. SEWARD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk as a question of privilege.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the resolution will be read, and then will be subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain any point of order upon it.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, at the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress, reported articles of impeachment against George F. Seward, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to China, charging him with high crimes and misdemeanors in office, and specifying among others the following:

First. Extortion and bribery, while consul-general at Shanghai, China, in his official capacity as judge of the consular court at Shanghai, China;

Second. Loaning of the moneys of the United States, in his own name, to private parties, at high and exorbitant rates of interest, while consul-general at Shanghai, China, and, on default in payment, procuring the mortgages given to secure said loans to be foreclosed in the court at Shanghai, China, he the said Seward sitting as judge and signing the decree for sale of the property described in said mortgages, and, after sale, confirming the title under said sale in himself;

Third. A violation of the treaties existing between the United States and the Emperor of China;

Fourth. Appropriating and converting to his own use fees which by law belonged to subordinate officials under him, without their consent;

Fifth. Returning false vouchers to the Government of the United States of moneys received by him;

Sixth. Embezzling large sums of money belonging to the United States and converting the same to his own use;

Seventh. Unlawfully removing from the office of consul-general at Shanghai, China, one John C. Myers, and appointing one Oliver B. Bradford, with intent thereby to conceal the evidence of his various crimes and misdemeanors while in office as consul-general aforesaid;

Eighth. Rendering false quarterly returns to the Government of the United States of moneys received by him in his official capacity as consul-general aforesaid, and as minister to Peking, China, aforesaid; and

Ninth. Specifying many other crimes and misdemeanors committed by the said Seward, both while consul-general and minister plenipotentiary as aforesaid, each and all of which brought disgrace upon the American people, and the Government of the United States into contempt with the empire to which he was the representative; and

Whereas, the said House of Representatives did not finally act upon and dispose of said articles of impeachment at its last session, by reason of the fact that the House, when the question was put upon the resolution of impeachment, was left without a quorum; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the grave character of the crimes charged against the said George F. Seward, the Administration now in power have failed to remove the said George F. Seward as minister to China, aforesaid, but have directed him to return to China as the representative of the American people to that government; and

Whereas the good name and interests of our Government require that its representatives to the other countries of the world should be free from even the suspicion of criminality: Therefore,

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, submitted at the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress, in the matter of the investigation of charges against the said George F. Seward while consul-general at Shanghai and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to China, the articles of impeachment and resolutions reported thereon, together with all the testimony and proceedings taken by said committee on said investigation, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and that the said Committee on the Judiciary are hereby instructed to consider said report, resolutions, articles of impeachment, testimony, and proceedings, and by sub-committee, or otherwise as they may direct, to sit during vacation and take such other testimony as they may deem necessary, having power therefor to send for and compel the attendance of persons and the production of books and papers, and to report their proceedings and make such further and other report as they may deem necessary and expedient; such report to be made at as early a day as practicable during the next session of Congress.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that that matter has never been referred to a committee of this House, and is not a privileged question for any individual member to present.

Mr. SPRINGER. In reference to the point of order I will state that this resolution refers to the impeachment of a public officer. One of the matters proposed to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary by this resolution, is a resolution to the effect that George F. Seward, minister plenipotentiary of the United States to China be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors. That resolution, among other things, is proposed to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report thereon and to take such additional evidence as they may deem necessary; the resolution of impeachment is one of the matters which is specially stated in the rules to be privileged.

Mr. CALKINS. This House knows nothing about the proceedings of the last House; there is nothing pending before this House in relation to the proposed impeachment of this officer.

Mr. SPRINGER. So far as that is concerned, this is new matter.

Mr. CALKINS. And this is subject to the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. All the facts are stated in the resolution itself. I will cite the rule in a moment.

Mr. CONGER. I want to make my objection to the introduction of the proposition. I object to it generally, if it is subject to objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be kind enough to state distinctly the point of order that he raises against the introduction of this proposition.

Mr. CONGER. My objection to it is that it is not in order at this time, at any rate; that is my objection to it upon the ground of privilege. I object to it under my right to object to the introduction of a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question involved is a single question, whether this is a question of privilege.

Mr. CONGER. That is the objection.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] will allow me, inasmuch as the resolution recites a great many facts, I ask that it be reported again from the Clerk's desk.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no!

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CALKINS. I do it for this reason: I make the point of order that this Congress cannot take judicial knowledge of what took place in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. This Congress has the power to take from the files of the House papers and re-refer them. That is a daily practice.

Mr. CALKINS. That is why I ask that the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. That is the way that a current history of the legislation of the country can be kept up.

Mr. CALKINS. That is the reason why I ask that the resolution be reported again. I do not ask that the preamble be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution can be read again.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If an objection will prevent its being read, then I object. It has just been read to a very silent House.

The SPEAKER. The part to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] refers might be read.

Mr. CALKINS. I mean the resolution simply, not the preamble.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have no objection to that being read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to ask whether testimony taken in the Forty-fifth Congress is to be regarded by this Congress as evidence in a case against Mr. Seward; that is, regarded as if taken by this Congress?

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the Committee on the Judiciary, if referred, or for the House, and not for the Chair.

Mr. SPRINGER. This is precisely the suggestion which was made at the last session of Congress by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I have accepted the proposition he then made, to refer all these papers to the Committee on the Judiciary of this House. It was a recommendation from the other side of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that I object to the introduction of this joint resolution as a question of privilege. And another point——

The SPEAKER. One at a time.

Mr. CONGER. The two are connected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear.

Mr. CONGER. This involves also the giving of additional powers to a committee of this House, and the expenditure of money by that committee, with the right to send for persons and papers, which certainly cannot be a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The question whether it be a question of privilege is a very simple one, which arises under the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution declares that the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment. The question whether this particular officer comes within the range of that constitutional provision seems to have been admitted in the last Congress and is not now controverted. This officer being liable to impeachment, it follows that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to raise a point of order not suggested by the gentleman from Michigan: that at the expiration of the Forty-fifth Congress all testimony and evidence which was taken under the jurisdiction of that Congress expired with the expiration of the Congress, and cannot be revived in the Forty-sixth Congress by a resolution of this kind.

The SPEAKER. Any paper which goes on file and becomes a part of the archives of Congress is open to the inspection and under the control of any subsequent Congress.

Mr. CALKINS. But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a further point of order, founded upon the analogy to judicial proceedings. In all courts, whenever the current term expires, testimony taken in any cause falls with the expiration of that term, and if parties desire to use it at a subsequent term that testimony must be taken de novo. Testimony taken at a former trial cannot be used in a new trial in any court in which I have ever had experience. That analogy, I contend, applies in this case.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House, or for a committee, if referred.

Mr. CALKINS. The testimony taken in regard to Mr. Seward by the Forty-fifth Congress has become of no effect. If that testimony is to be used for any purpose, it must be taken de novo. I make this point, and insist upon it as a matter of common right, common justice, and common law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects a notable instance where the record of an investigation, and the evidence in reference to the Pacific and China mail subsidy was taken up and referred in a subsequent Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. There are several precedents upon record where evidence taken in a previous Congress has been referred to a committee in a succeeding Congress. I might cite such cases if it were necessary; but the point is too plain, I think, to need further argument. It is in order for this House to refer to a committee anything that is a proper matter of legislation or a proper subject for consideration by the committee.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman evidently does not apprehend my point. My point is that the investigation in regard to the conduct of this man, if it is to be made the subject of any action by the House, must take place de novo. It is a new case in this House and must proceed as if no case had been pending in the Forty-fifth Congress. That is my point.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Committee on the Judiciary will understand how to deal with the question, I presume, when it arises in the committee. They are authorized to take additional testimony if they deem it necessary.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Is the resolution subject to the point of order that it involves an expenditure of money?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that it makes any appropriation.

Mr. SPRINGER. It does not involve an expenditure of money any more than any other law of Congress would involve an expenditure of money. It does not authorize the appointment of any new agent or the incurring of any additional liability.

Mr. CONGER. The resolution will speak for itself.

Mr. SPRINGER. And if it did authorize an expenditure of money, the point would not avail, as the resolution is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds no appropriation of money in the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. But it authorizes the committee to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. How would the proceeding be conducted unless the hearing of witnesses was authorized? That matter is naturally covered by the question of privilege.

Mr. CONGER. But notwithstanding the privilege which allows such a resolution to come before the House, another rule must send it to the Committee of the Whole if it involves an expenditure of money.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sees on the face of the resolution no provision for the expenditure of money.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the fact that the resolution authorizing the creation of what is known as the "Potter committee," which was decided to be a question of privilege, was in precisely similar language to this resolution; it authorized the sending for persons and papers. Afterward Congress made an appropriation for paying the expenses of the committee. But the resolution appointing that committee was not subject to any point of order because of the authority to send for persons and papers.

Mr. CONGER. The point of order was not made in that case. It is no precedent, as the point was not raised.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the calling of witnesses would be a natural sequence to authorizing an investigation of this kind; the proceeding would be very unjust to the officer proposed to be impeached if such authority was not conferred.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The matter to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred was in cipher, and we could not tell what it was.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman understands it now, I have no doubt.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman knows the price of Indian agents now and several other things.

Mr. HUMPHREY. And the country understands the matter.

Mr. CONGER. That this will require an expenditure of money seems to me so plain that there can be no question about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read a ruling directly in point.

Mr. CALKINS. Before that is read will the Chair allow me a word? I do not desire to be captious; I do not wish to treat the House or the Speaker with any discourtesy; but I do insist on my point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please state his point again; the Chair has not yet understood it.

Mr. CALKINS. I insist upon the point that at the expiration of the Forty-fifth Congress all the testimony and other proceedings in the case against Mr. Seward became dead, of no effect, and cannot be revived by a resolution of this kind. Let me illustrate. When the Senate of the United States had failed to convict Andrew Johnson upon articles of impeachment, could a subsequent House of Representatives by a resolution of this kind have revived all the evidence on which the impeachment had been based by the House, and could the case upon that evidence have been presented again to the Senate? I say that proceedings of this kind become dead and of no effect upon the expiration of the Congress in which they are had, and that no resolution can revive such proceedings or such testimony for the purpose of referring them to a committee of the present House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks on the point of order presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS,] that it is competent for this House to take papers from the files or from the custody of an officer authorized to take charge of them, and refer those papers to any appropriate committee for consideration by that committee. What that committee may do with such papers, whether they shall deem them to be valid as against a public officer or valid in any other sense, it is not for the Chair to determine. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order and decides that it is competent for this House to take from its files any papers and refer them to a committee.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not wish to wrestle with the opinion the Chair has expressed, but I wish further to ask whether the Chair thinks that that testimony ——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no opinion to express on the subject of testimony or its validity.

Mr. CALKINS. But it is a legitimate inference from this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair only decides in reference to parliamentary law, and not questions of common or statute law or practice thereunder.

Mr. CALKINS. But I understand this resolution to go further than that. I understand this resolution to authorize that committee upon that testimony alone, if that committee shall so decide, to present new articles of impeachment—to present new articles of impeachment upon testimony which was taken during the last Congress and which is now dead.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now come to the point presented by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] and will read from the Manual.

Where a bill may incidentally involve expense, but yet does not directly require appropriations, it does not necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole.

That is a decision of the House, first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, page 1333 of the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CALKINS. I hope the gentleman will allow me one word.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the Chair has decided that question, and it is for the committee to decide what weight they shall give to the testimony. The committee can consider that testimony or take any part of it over again as it may decide.

Mr. CALKINS. Is that the scope of the resolution?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not understand that to be the scope of the resolution, and that is where the gentleman and I differ.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has nothing to do with the scope of the resolution. That is for the members of the House to decide in their vote as to the propriety of its passage. The Chair rules simply on the parliamentary law and the rules of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 4.

The SPEAKER. The preamble and resolution are adopted. [Cries of "No quorum!" and "Oh, no!"] The Chair will order tellers if the point is made that no quorum has voted.

The point was withdrawn.

So the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETER PHILLIPS AND JACOB B. KING.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Peter Phillips and Jacob B. King, no adverse report having been made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. THOMAS TURNER, on account of sickness in his family.

CAPTAIN BROOME.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the report of Captain Broome, United States Marine Corps, as to the prisons of the States, and referred on the 7th May last to the Committee on Naval Affairs, be ordered to be printed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report to the House that report of Captain Broome, and to ask that it be printed and recommitted. If the Speaker will recognize me for that purpose I will make that report.

Mr. FISHER. Then I withdraw my resolution.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I now, under instructions from the Committee on Naval Affairs, report back the communication of the Secretary of the Navy concerning the report of Captain Broome relating to the prison discipline of the United States and other countries, and move that it be printed and recommitted, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS ON DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

Mr. GILLETTE. I desire to present a petition signed by three hundred settlers on the Des Moines River lands in Iowa, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD without the names.

Mr. FIELD. I object.

FORTS ABERCROMBIE, SEWARD, AND RANSON.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting report of the General of the Army regarding House bill No. 1305, abolishing the military reservations of Forts Abercrombie, Seward, and Ranson, Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

BARRACKS, ETC., AT SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting letter from the chief quartermaster's department of Texas in regard to advisability of erection of barracks and quarters at San Antonio, Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INTERNAL REVENUE BUREAU.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue relative to an estimated deficiency in the appropriations for salaries and expenses of agents, surveyors, and other officers of that bureau; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, concerning balance of appropriations under the last Army appropriation act; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PATENT OF HENRY VOETLER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House adopted on the 23d of May calling for information in the matter of the extension of the patent of Henry Voetler for improvement in reducing wood to paper pulp; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT PADUCAH AND COVINGTON, KENTUCKY.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2169) to furnish public books and reports to the clerks of United States courts at Paducah and Covington, in the State of Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WATER SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a House bill in regard to the water rates in the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments. I have consulted with all of the committee who are present, and all who took part in the passage of the bill except one, and they authorize me to recommend concurrence in the Senate amendments.

There being no objection the bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer on the commissioners of the District of Columbia the powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 4, after "Columbia," insert "excepting such powers and duties as belong to the Chief of Engineers."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia certain powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

Mr. HUNTON. I move that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes, with Senate amendments, that I may move concurrence in the amendments.

Mr. FINLEY. I should like to hear the Senate amendments read.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is there any general legislation on the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether there is any legislation other than the establishment of post-routes in the amendments of the Senate?

Mr. COOK. No, sir.

Mr. FINLEY. Then I withdraw my request for the reading of the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, for twelve days, from noon on Friday next, on account of professional business.

COMMITTEE ON CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Civil Service Reform to report the resolution which I send to the desk and to ask its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Civil-Service Reform be vested with all the powers which were heretofore possessed by the same committee of the Forty-fifth Congress, as well under the resolution creating it as under subsequent resolutions adopted by the House.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that resolution. Let the powers conferred upon the committee be stated in the resolution itself, and perhaps there may be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana can state what the powers are which he proposes to confer upon the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Let him state the powers in the resolution. We do not know what powers were conferred upon this committee in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana can state the powers which he seeks to have revived.

Mr. CONGER. I think it better that he should incorporate them in the resolution. I object to the resolution now in this form.

Mr. KENNA. I desire to report from the Committee on Civil Service the following resolution, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives one month's pay to Robert P. Blaylock, a page in the House in the Forty-fifth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that the Committee of Accounts decline to consider sundry matters in reference to pay, and claims for pay, of employés of former Congresses, and have asked that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims, as they are unwilling to consider such.

Mr. KENNA. I made the motion in pursuance of the instructions of the committee.

Mr. BOYD. I desire to say that the Committee of Accounts will not take notice of claims arising in the last Congress.

Mr. KENNA. I am willing that it should be referred to the Com mittee of Claims.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill making additional appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and I ask that the same be the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour for consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole, under the five-minute rule, with one hour for general debate.

Mr. MILLS. Is that a report from the Committee on Appropriations?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COX. I object to allowing such a short period for debate upon this bill. It is cutting up by the roots the law in relation to letter-carriers passed by the last Congress.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am willing to allow two hours for debate.

Mr. O'NEILL. I object to the proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Allow me to make a suggestion. I have tried for two or three days to be recognized to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon this bill. Now, the appropriation ought to be made either under the existing law or as is proposed by the bill. In either event, I want the appropriation made.

Mr. COX. The appropriation proposed by the gentleman is not in accordance with the existing law.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then a majority of the House can change it.

Mr. COX. Then you ought not to state that it is in accordance with the existing law.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to state that I doubt if this appropriation for additional pay of carriers can be made at this session unless this order be made.

Mr. O'NEILL. I know that in the last Congress we passed a bill making appropriations for the pay of letter-carriers, after a long discussion, and am not willing as one to give unanimous consent for a bill like this to be made the special order of the day. I would be willing that a bill to provide for the payment of letter-carriers under the existing law should be made the special order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to make one statement. To carry out the existing law would require an additional appropriation of $500,000, in round numbers. Now, if it be the temper of the House to make that appropriation, well and good; if it be not the temper of the House, then let the law be modified, and if we take up the bill for consideration the House by a majority can do what it chooses in the matter.

The SPEAKER. The objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would probably prevent any legislation on the subject at this session. Opportunity to consider amendments can be offered if the House desires.

Mr. O'NEILL. My objection is to the bill coming up to-morrow. If the gentleman wants to pass a law for the payment of the letter-carriers under the existing law, I am willing to let it come up here now.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If the gentleman wants to prevent them from being paid, well and good.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want them paid under the existing law.

SPECIAL POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. EVINS, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, by unanimous consent, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (S. No. 516) to extend the time of the special postal service until service can be obtained by advertisement.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in cases where special service has already been placed on new routes, the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, extend such service until the time when service can be obtained by advertisement. And whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail-route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established or new service required, or when, from any other cause, there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding one year, until the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law. And any provision of statute in conflict with this provision is hereby repealed.

The amendment reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads was to insert after the word "advertisement," in the fourth line, the words "not exceeding in any case one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EVINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill, as amended, was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BICKNELL: The petition of G. M. Spurgeon and others, for a post-route from Chestnut Hill to Blue River, Indiana—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HENRY: The petition of members and officers of the Womans' National Christian Temperance Union and others, that no change be made in the revenue laws to promote the interest of dealers in spirituous liquors—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. RYAN, of Kansas: The petition of settlers upon the Osage Indian trust lands, in the State of Kansas, for the extension of the term in which payment for the same is required under the pre-emption laws—to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WAIT: The petition of Mary Shea, widowed mother of Miles Shea, for the removal of the charge of desertion against her son, to enable her to recover a pension refused on that ground—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee: The petition of W. A. Galloway, for compensation for property taken by the United States Army—to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 5, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SYDNEY AND MELBOURNE INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITIONS.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report back without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the international exhibitions to be held at Sydney and Melbourne, Australia, in 1879 and 1880, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It appropriates $20,000 to provide for the acceptance of the invitation communicated by the British government to the Government of the United States and the representation of the United States at the exhibitions named.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 661) to authorize the Secretary of War to use certain moneys appropriated by act of Congress approved March 4, 1879, "for the protection of the high sand-banks on the Chippewa River" in the completion and protection of improvements in and near the mouth of said Chippewa River; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ELECTIONS IN RHODE ISLAND.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to place before the Senate and have printed an amendment which I intend to offer to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] on the 27th of May, referring the memorial of J. B. Greene, of Rhode Island, to the Select Committee to inquire into alleged frauds in the late Elections. I ask that the proposed amendment be printed and laid upon the table until the matter is called up again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

SAMUEL LORD, JR., RECEIVER.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 62) for the delivery to Samuel Lord, jr., receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States, which was reported yesterday from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FERRY. I will say to the Senator from New York that I do not object to the consideration of the bill, but I notice that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] who objected to it yesterday is not in his seat.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from Vermont asked for the letters from the Treasury Department. I have them here now. I did not have them yesterday; they were in the committee-room.

Mr. FERRY. Then I ask that they be read, so that they may appear in the RECORD.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask to have read first the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to an inquiry——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet put the question on proceeding to the consideration of the bill. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator from Michigan has asked that the letters be read. I send to the desk the one that I desire to be read first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letters will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 21, 1879.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 14th instant, inclosing a draught of a bill (S. No. 1235) for the delivery to Samuel Lord, jr., receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States.

In answer to your request that I will inform you as to the propriety of the passage of the above bill I send you herewith copy of letters from D. Heaton, late special agent in North Carolina, to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated April 18 and April 27, 1866, respectively, relative to certain bonds of the State of South Carolina received by the agent from a provost-marshal; also copy of a letter of the Secretary to the United States Treasurer, dated January 6, 1868, inclosing those bonds.

The records and files of this Department show that there was collected of the coupons due on the bonds and covered into the Treasury on the 13th of July, 1869, to the credit of the "captured and abandoned property fund" the sum of $479, for coupons due on January 1, 1868, July 1, 1868, January 1, 1869, and July 1, 1869. No other sums have been collected on coupons overdue, which, with the bonds, are in the custody of the Treasurer.

The bonds were never sold under the provisions of the captured and abandoned property acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, and the sum collected for the coupons was received in the Treasury after the time had expired within which a suit might be instituted in the Court of Claims under the above acts for the return of the money.

As the Secretary of the Treasury has no power to restore the bonds or the avails of the coupons collected, any rights or equities of the original owner at the time of the seizure can be recognized and relief given by Congress only.

Respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. FRANCIS KERNAN,
United States Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. I now send to the Secretary's desk two of the letters inclosed by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing how these bonds came into the Treasury. I ask that they be read in the order in which they are pasted together.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SIXTH SPECIAL AGENCY,
New Berne, North Carolina, April 18, 1866.

SIR: I have in my possession, as superintending special agent, four South Carolina bonds, numbered respectively 812, 821, 836, and 837, calling for $1,000 each.

Each bond is entitled "State of South Carolina 6 per cent. bond, issued under the act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of the Blue Ridge Railroad in South Carolina,' passed December, 1854," signed by R. F. W. Allston, governor, and T. J. Pickens, comptroller-general, with coupons attached.

All coupons previous to July 1, 1865, are cut off; those at that date and subsequent remain. The coupons are filled up "To Bank of the State of South Carolina."

These bonds were turned over to me some months since as captured property by the provost-marshal of this place. Being in doubt as to the proper steps to take in their disposition, I respectfully submit the matter for your consideration. They can doubtless be disposed of at a large per centum.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. HEATON,
Superintending Special Agent.

Hon. HUGH MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SIXTH SPECIAL AGENCY,
New Berne, North Carolina, April 27, 1866.

SIR: Your letter of the 24th instant has been received, and in accordance with your instructions I herewith forward to you by express the four South Carolina bonds described in my letter of the 18th instant.

I do not know it to be a fact, but it is my impression these bonds were brought to this place by some one connected with Sherman's army at the time of the march through South Carolina. Having come into the possession of the provost-marshal of this place they were turned over to me, as superintending special agent, as captured property.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. HEATON,
Superintending Special Agent.

Hon. HUGH MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KERNAN. I now send to the desk a copy of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Treasurer inclosing to him these bonds. This is a copy also inclosed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the committee.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 6, 1868.

SIR: Inclosed herewith you will find four one-thousand-dollar bonds of the State of South Carolina, with coupons attached, payable to bearer, six of them past due, which were forwarded to me from North Carolina in April, 1866, by Supervising Special Agent David Heaton as captured property turned over to him by a provost-marshal.

You will please receive and hold them as a special deposit, collecting the coupons, if practicable, and reserving the bonds for further instructions.

I should be happy to receive at any time a report of any information you may collect concerning the salable character and market value of these bonds.

Respectfully,

H. MCCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

F. E. SPINNER,
Treasurer United States, Special Agent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The motion was agreed to.

CASE OF FITZ JOHN PORTER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the "proceedings and report" of the board of officers, convened by Special Orders No. 78, Headquarters of the Army, Washington, April 12, 1878, in the case of Fitz John Porter. The report of the board was made in March last, but the official record of the proceedings did not reach me until the 3d instant.

I have given to this report such examination as satisfies me that I ought to lay the proceedings and conclusions of the board before Congress. As I am without power, in the absence of legislation, to act upon the recommendations of the report further than by submitting the same to Congress, the proceedings and conclusions of the board are transmitted for the information of Congress, and such action as in your wisdom shall seem expedient and just.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 5, 1879.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I move that the message and documents be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the per diem pay of each juror, grand or petit, in any court of the United States, shall be $2.50; and that the last clause of section 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which refers to the State of Pennsylvania, and sections 801, 820, and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are hereby repealed; and that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less than three hundred persons, possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, and of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein. But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State. And no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, nor be compelled to serve as such juror more than two weeks at any term unless it be necessary in order to complete the trial of a cause in which he may have been impaneled; and all juries to serve in courts after the passage of this act shall be drawn in conformity herewith. All general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I understood yesterday from the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] that he desired to address the Senate upon the subject-matter of this bill, and therefore I yield to him for the purpose of expressing his views upon it, and after he has concluded I will give my reasons why this bill should become a law.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, I beg to acknowledge my obligations to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] for the courtesy which enables me to submit a few remarks to the Senate; and in taking up the bill which he has laid before the Senate, I do not propose to discuss it specially; I rather prefer to make general remarks upon the subjects which have been under discussion during this session.

The main reason why I do not desire to speak particularly to this bill is that I can hardly suppose there is a Senator on this floor who will object to its passage, for it strikes from the statute-book one of the most infamous laws which have ever disgraced legislation. It is simply to strike off a law which was placed there, if not by mistake, by fraud, and I therefore do not feel that it is necessary for me to enter into the discussion further than simply to give an illustration of how the present law can be used to tyrannize over the people of the country.

In the recent trials in the United States circuit court at Charleston a short time ago a jury was summoned. One of the judges who was on the bench could not take the test oath. The district attorney had been in the confederate army; the assistant attorney had likewise been in that army. They of course could not take the test oath. And yet when the jurors were brought up every democrat had that oath applied to him, while all men who were not democrats, men who had served through the whole war, if they were republicans, were allowed to take their places upon that jury without having the oath administered to them. I think it is not necessary to say anything more to show the impropriety, to say the least, of allowing a law of that sort to stand.

There are many reasons which make me reluctant to obtrude my views on the Senate at this time. I recognize fully the propriety of that unwritten rule of the Senate which imposes silence upon the new and inexperienced members of this body until they have become familiar by association with the experience of their older and wiser colleagues. The physical disability under which I labor not only makes all exertion painful to me, but unfits me to do justice either to the great questions now pending or to myself, and I cannot, therefore, address the Senate at length. Nor is it necessary to do so. Argument, rhetoric, invective, and denunciation have been exhausted by our opponents, and I can scarcely hope that any utterances of mine will allay the prejudices which have been aroused or carry conviction to the minds of the people.

These are potent reasons to enforce my silence, and under ordinary circumstances I should have adhered to my determination to take no part in the debates of this session. But the subjects which have engaged the attention of Congress and of the country during the present session are not of ordinary importance, and the tone and temper of the debate, which has been prolonged through weeks of vehement and angry denunciation, impose upon the representatives of the South at least the duty of honest protest. Against my wishes, therefore, and under every disadvantage imposed upon me by my physical condition, I must, as one of those representatives, ask the indulgence of the Senate while I place upon record my earnest protest against the injustice and the unfairness with which we have been treated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would state to the Senator from South Corolina that if at any time it would be more convenient to him to speak sitting he is at perfect liberty to do so.

Mr. HAMPTON. I thank you, sir.

Day after day have we listened while Senators of great reputation, high ability, and whose words are the creed of thousands of conscientious and patriotic citizens, have denounced the opinions and the actions of southern men as revolutionary and treasonable. It has been declared that the democratic caucus rules the Senate and that the southern members rule the caucus, dictating the policy to be pursued. The able and distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] with equal truth, justice, and candor has, it is true, met and refuted that charge by assuming for the northern and western democracy the responsibility of the present political situation. But in spite of this generous assumption of responsibility on his part, the truth still remains that we of the South do make the democratic majority in this Chamber, and we are thus as responsible for what we approve and support as for what we suggest. I have not the presumption to make any claim to leadership here, but while not attempting to lead it is my duty to know where and whom I follow, and for any vote which I may cast here I shall never endeavor to shield myself from responsibility behind any man or any party. If the policy I support is revolutionary, I am the revolutionist; if there is treason in my vote, I am the traitor.

But, sir, I ask in all seriousness what are the issues before the Senate to which such language is appropriate? I might demand of Senators on the other side the proof that any action of ours was revolutionary; I might open the Constitution and, reading its precise and emphatic definition of treason, ask who of us is "levying war against the United States or giving aid and comfort to their enemies," or what overt act of violence we are proposing to commit? But I do not desire to make a mere technical argument. I desire to meet the accusation in its spirit as well as in its letter. What are the issues before us? Let us understand them distinctly. But first let me say what are not the issues we are discussing. To me there is no question, there can be none, as to the propriety of making the appropriations necessary for the support of the Government in all its departments. Upon this point there shall be no misapprehension of my position. By no vote of mine will the appropriations necessary for the efficient maintenance of the Army be refused. It is competent for Congress to declare under what limitations and upon what conditions the appropriation is to be made. The form in which this is done I regard as immaterial. In my judgment it would have been best to adhere to the usual form; but as it has been deemed advisable to make the necessary appropriations in another manner, I shall, in order to secure unanimity, acquiesce in the decision of the majority. But in no event can I consent to aid in disbanding the Army or in impairing its efficiency. It is the Army of the South as well as of the North; it is the Army of the whole country. In its history, from the days of the Revolution through its achievements of 1812 and the glories of the Mexican war, I have some reason, by right of birth and of blood, to be proud. In the late civil contest, on many a bloody field, I tested its valor, and no word nor act of mine shall depreciate its value or lessen its usefulness. But because I so regard it no act of mine shall tend to degrade its rank and file into a police squad nor convert its officers into detectives. I will not so legislate that against its own honorable instincts and traditions it shall be the instrument of tyranny in the hands of a factious party or of an executive who might be so unscrupulous as to use it unlawfully. Nor shall I consent, because of any difference of opinion upon matters of legislation between the majority and the minority or between the majority and the President, to close the courts of justice, stop the administration of the Departments, and embarrass the necessary and orderly life of the Government. The Constitution, which I have not idly sworn to support, has provided the means by which an appeal to the country can be taken, and it is for the people to decide whether the presidential veto has been wisely and patriotically used to defeat the will of this Congress which represents a vast majority of the citizens of the United States. My duty will have been performed when I have used all the power with which that Constitution has intrusted me. The President and the minority in Congress must be responsible for the use of theirs. And while these are my general views of my duty, I certainly have no inducement, no disposition, to embarrass the present Administration.

It is a source of profound regret to me that the President could not find himself able to approve the bills he has vetoed. To me they seem to embody but simple declarations of constitutional principles, and to be in entire conformity with the policy which he has announced repeatedly as the one that he would pursue. But I am not disposed on account of this difference, grave though it be, to denounce his action nor to impugn his motives. I am well aware that his position is not easy nor his responsibility light. I remember, and the people whom I represent remember, that in a critical period of our history, in disregard of the passions and in opposition to the wishes of the party who placed him in his present position, with doubt as to the result of his independent action, moved, as I honestly believe, by his convictions of duty, he withdrew the Federal troops from the State-houses of South Carolina and Louisiana, thus enabling the people of these States to restore their local governments to those who represent the popular will, as well as the character, the intelligence, and the property of the two States. For this action, wise and patriotic as I am sure that history will record it, I for one am grateful. And while in the honest and necessary party differences which must arise in a free country it will be my duty, with all the energy and ability I possess, to oppose the partisan policy of which he is the representative, my opposition shall not be captious. Nor shall I by bitter and acrimonious censure drive him into dependence on those who would in their selfish rush for power trample on him and on us. I trust, therefore, in what I have to say that I shall be able to speak with truth and soberness.

What, then, let me ask again, are the issues before the country upon which any action of ours can be called revolutionary or treasonable? If the repealing acts which have been suggested were passed to-day, we should simply be remanded to the legislation under which the country has lived and moved and had its being for seventy-five years of its existence. Can such a restoration be revolution or treason?

Surely not, unless the intervening war has so changed our relations to each other that the old constitutional legislation is no longer applicable to our condition; and yet this is really what Senators on the other side would have the country believe. I ask, in all candor, would such legislation as we now seek to repeal have been conceived or defended by any statesman before the late war? Would any President from 1789 to 1861 ever have dreamed of sending the Army of the United States to keep the peace at the polls or of appointing Federal supervisors and marshals to superintend the popular ballot? If not, then the necessity for the maintenance of this legislation arises from something new in the relations of the States to the Union. Will any Senator point out what that new element is? If any exists, what is the difference in the relations a State holds to the Union to-day and those of the same State before the war? If there is none, and I venture to say that none can be pointed out, wherein consists the necessity for any such legislation to-day which did not exist then? This question should, I think, be fairly answered, because it is the point upon which the accusations against the South rest. If all that we ask is what existed for three-quarters of a century of our existence, how can it be revolutionary or treasonable to make this demand? If the democratic doctrine that Federal troops cannot lawfully be used at the polls, or cannot interfere in State matters unless specially requested to do so by the constituted authorities of a State be a heresy, we have the strongest republican authority to sustain that heresy. In his message to the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in January, 1871, Governor John W. Geary used the following language:

> The employment of troops of the United States at elections, without the consent of the local and State governments, has recently received considerable attention and reprehension. * * * Under any circumstances, in my opinion, it is unsafe and antagonistic to the principles that should govern our republican institutions. At the last October elections, United States troops were stationed in Philadelphia for the avowed purpose of enforcing the election laws. This was done without the consent or even the knowledge of the civil authorities of either the city or the State, and without any expressed desire on the part of the citizens, and, as far as can be ascertained, without existing necessity.

The democratic party stands to-day where Governor Geary, a stanch republican, stood then. Nor are we without other and equally as high republican authority to sustain the position taken by our party. Hon. Carl Schurz, now a distinguished member of the present Cabinet, in his place on this floor made this memorable protest against the scandalous and unconstitutional use of Federal soldiery in Louisiana:

> United States soldiers, with fixed bayonets, decided the case against them, and took them out of the legislative hall by force. * * * I cannot, therefore, escape from the deliberate conviction, a conviction conscientiously formed, that the deed done on the 4th of January, in the State-house of Louisiana, by the military forces of the United States, constitutes a gross and manifest violation of the Constitution and laws of this Republic. * * * If this can be done in Louisiana, and if such things be sustained by Congress, how long will it be before it can be done in Massachusetts and Ohio.
> He who in a place like ours fails to stop, or even justifies a blow at the fundamental laws of the land, makes himself the accomplice of those who strike at the life of the Republic and at the liberties of the people.

The present able Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, in his great speech on the same subject in New York, was even more emphatic than his colleague in the Cabinet, and his words could well be adopted now to formulate the creed of the democratic party. He used the following language:

> When men vote, and when their chosen officers meet, and when without violence and without demonstration of insurrection they undertake to conduct the affairs of their political government, no soldiers can interfere.
> There are two very distinct firm lines of limitation, which observed will protect the machinery of the Government for the people to-day; that is, that the sole intervention of the Federal power within State authority shall be to suppress violence, and that their office after that shall not assume to go further unless when invited by the supreme authority of the State.
> What use is it to give the purse and the sword to the House of Commons if the King or the President by military power can determine what shall be the constitution of the House of Commons or the House of Congress? And that is what they fought for in England. * * * And for this reason the people of the United States are justified in assuming that the supreme civil power shall dominate over the military, and that no merging of them or interference with them shall be permitted.

Now, Mr. President, shall we be denounced simply because we plant ourselves, not only where the fathers of the Republic stood, but where the great lights of the republican party have declared the only true constitutional position can be found. Now, sir, I venture to assert that underlying the whole argument on the other side are two assumptions: first, that the war has so developed the independent existence of the Federal Government as distinguished from the States as to give it greater power, larger influence, and more direct interest in congressional elections than it possessed before; second, that the Administration, as the representative of that party which elected it and in control of the Federal machinery, is bound to use that power and influence in the protection of these interests. In other words, that the privileges and prerogatives of the States are to be obliterated, not by force, but by the subtler though not less destructive influences of two great national parties using the powers of the Federal Government as weapons of party warfare.

Now, I do not propose to make any constitutional argument on this subject. It is sufficient for me to say that I hold the form and character of our Government to have been unaltered by the late war, and that the mutual relations of the General Government and the several States of the Union remain precisely as they were when the Union was formed. I hold that the recent constitutional amendments have wrought no change in these relations and in these views. I am sustained by the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Collector vs. Day, reported in eleventh volume Wallace. In this case, Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language:

> The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres.

In the same decree the ensuing words are used:

> Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable that without them the General Government itself would disappear from the family of nations, &c.

I maintain, therefore, that the Constitution has not been changed in its essential features by the late amendments, and that it is therefore now what it was before the war, so that when the country demanded the preservation of the Union by a restoration of the States it meant such a Union and such States as the Constitution recognized. Can any advocate of a strong government, which is but another term for centralization, suppose for one instant that the founders of our Republic contemplated or would have countenanced the exercise of such powers by the Federal Government as are claimed for it by the legislation we are seeking to repeal? Does any Senator here believe that this is a safe, a wholesome condition of public affairs? Putting aside all extreme theories of State rights, does not every Senator recognize the fact that one of the elements of our political safety has been the manner in which local State interests have acted and reacted within the States upon national politics, so that until just before the war we never have had great national parties which divided the country between them simply on Federal issues. Local influences had always to be considered. But if in the future we are to have only great national parties in behalf of one or the other of which the Administration is to interfere directly, we are on the high road to a consolidation even more dangerous because more violent and variable than a recognized change in the Government.

My objection, therefore, to this legislation which the war called forth is not its immediate danger. It is not the actual Army which I fear or its direct influence. But I do most strenuously object to any legislation which affords any excuse or justification to the Government that it has the right or interest in any way or in any degree to interfere with the perfect freedom of elections. The roughness or even riot of an election is no greater than any other violation of the peace; and no State in this Union is without ample means of suppression. And if the State authorities are unable or unwilling to do their duty you have not now, you will not have for generations to come, an Army strong enough to take their place. It is better so; better that in one or two great cities, nay, in one or two great States, there should be temporary turbulence, confusion, than that in the whole country there should be military despotism. Congress has the right to decide who shall take his seat as representative and who shall not. Congress can punish with disfranchisement any community which would force into these Halls an improperly elected member; and that is a safer, a surer, a more constitutional safeguard than the exercise of any doubtful or unlawful power by the Federal Government.

But, Mr. President, unjust as have been the assumptions against the South to which I have alluded, there are others not less grave. There has run through this whole discussion the strong and steady current of insinuation that the South is not true to the Union; that its object in pressing the repeal of those measures which we deem dangerous to our liberties is to give us a freer field for conspiracy and a better opportunity to suppress by force and fraud the real voice of the southern people. We are tauntingly told that proof of these charges is found in the presence on this floor of twenty-two members who served in the confederate army, and the South is reproached, nay, denounced, for sending such men to represent her here. Sir, the answer to this charge is simple.

Nearly every man in the South who could bear arms was in her armies and she can scarcely be reproached with justice for trusting and honoring in peace the men who risked their fortunes and their lives for her in war. And when the fact is cited that while the South sends so many of her old soldiers to represent her in this august assembly the North sends but four, I submit that the reproach, if reproach rests anywhere, belongs rather to the North than to the South. I feel that I but speak the sentiments of every man here who was in the confederate service when I express my deep regret that there are not in this Chamber more of the men who met us in battle, for if opposed to us politically they would, if true soldiers and gentlemen, treat us with the respect that brave men never fail to accord to each other. And, sir, had these great opposing armies which for four years confronted each other in a death grapple been left to make and enforce the terms of peace, not only would the country have been spared much of the suffering and the humiliation it has experienced, but it would have enjoyed a peace honorable alike to conquerors and conquered. We should long ere this have seen a union re-established on the basis of fraternal reconciliation and a whole people bound together by the indissoluble bonds of mutual respect, common interests, and a common destiny. Such, at least, is the firm conviction of every true soldier in the South, and all her sons were soldiers. Nor is this conviction wanting among the brave soldiers of the North, for I have heard it expressed by them time and again.

That the men who truly represent the South are here to-day is due mainly to our friends on the other side. When you insisted that the States should return to the Union; when you called upon them to send back their Representatives, did you mean what you said or did you mean the Southern States to be rotten boroughs to be filled by nominations of the republican party? Indeed, did you not for fifteen years make them so? And I will leave it to the candor of republican Senators to say whether they are satisfied with the result of the experiment they made at such a frightful cost to us and to the whole country. We are here because we do represent the popular majority, the character, the intelligence, and the property of the States which have sent us. We are here because left to themselves the instincts of the recently enfranchised voters have taught them that their interests are identical with ours. We are here because, belonging to your own race, trained in the same political experience as your own, taught by years of rule how to govern, we could not be subordinated, and the people of the country did not wish us to be subordinated, to such a mass of ignorant voters as you had rashly and suddenly created. We are here, we trust, for the good of the whole country. What we were you knew when you insisted that we should still be part and parcel of this Union.

For the past you cannot expect us to apologize; to do so would be to sacrifice our own self-respect and to forfeit the respect of all honorable men. In the heat of conflict we struck hard blows, and doubtless we spoke hard words. But does remembering or repeating them now bring us any nearer to the peace and harmony for which the whole country so ardently longs? The men who served in the opposing armies are now the strongest advocates of a true reconciliation. We learned in a common school how to respect our enemies; we learned that personal courage and honor and truth were better guarantees of patriotism than constitutional learning or eloquent speech; we learned at least that in spite of differences, even unto death, there was a common country which we could better serve in friendship than in hatred, and were our antagonists of the late war here to-day, in the contests on this floor as in fiercer battles of yore, whoever might be the victor, we should be assured of a fair field and an honest surrender. [Applause in the galleries.] Judge us by our acts——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) The Senator will suspend. The Chair gives notice that if further applause occurs in the galleries he will order them to be cleared. Order must be preserved.

Mr. HAMPTON. Judge us now by our acts; and again I ask what are they to provoke distrust? We ask you to strike from the statute-book legislation which was as much the instrument of war, the expression of distrust, as were armies and navies and military districts. We say, if you bring us back as States, treat us as States. We ask you to remove the disability which forbids a citizen to serve on a jury when it does not forbid him to serve on the bench. We ask you to leave the ballot-box free, as it has been through nearly the whole of our political existence. You may refuse. You have the right to refuse if you hold our demands to be unwise or unconstitutional.

But surely in the face of the recent decision of the Supreme Court in regard to the jurors' oath, in face of the legislation of nearly a century in reference to military interference at the polls, you cannot charge us with revolution or treason in making these requests. Upon these issues we are willing to stand. If the people are with us we shall prevail and this war legislation will be repealed. If the people are with you, then this legislation will stand and we can learn to adapt ourselves to these changes in our old constitutional thoughts and habits as we have learned to adapt ourselves to others. In the great contest in which we failed we lost much. We lost power and wealth and precious lives. But when the people of the United States declare that the right of self-government is extinguished in the States; that the prerogative of a free vote, which is the distinguishing glory of American citizenship, can be exercised only under the supervision of a Federal marshal or the protection of a Federal soldier; that the duties of governors and Legislatures to maintain the dignity and to preserve the peace of sovereign States has been transferred to the President; and when it has become revolution and treason to ask the people to consider these things, then will the memory of our poor losses be forgotten in the overwhelming calamities which would follow the loss of American freedom.

> A thousand years scarce serve to form a State;
> An hour may lay it in the dust, and when
> Can man its shattered splendors renovate,
> Recall its virtues back, and vanquish time and fate.

Mr. President, patriotic men of all parties, North and South, can join heart and hand in the effort to perpetuate on this continent constitutional liberty as established by our fathers. In this noble work we of the South will not prove laggards. We wish to promote the best interests of the whole country; we wish to restore harmony and good-will; we hope to see permanent peace and widespread prosperity among all classes of our people; we desire to see the painful memories of the late unhappy war buried in our own hearts, not rising to the lips in bitter words which can only provoke sectional animosity, and we propose, in spite of misapprehension, misrepresentation, and denunciation, to stand firmly by the Constitution in its integrity, to maintain the Union in perpetuity, trusting, hoping, praying that to our children, if not to us, it may be given to see the States of this mighty Republic bound together, not alone by the ties of material interest, but by the cords of true fraternity, ruled by a great, a happy, a free people crowned with all the blessings and with all the glories which God in his infinite mercy can bestow. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the bill before the Senate was reported by me under the instruction of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I desire to occupy, for as short a time as possible, the attention of the Senate, that the features and results of the proposed legislation may be thoroughly and clearly understood.

The Senate is aware that this measure has already been ingrafted upon one of the general appropriation bills necessary for the supply of the Government. It has been passed by a constitutional majority of each House of Congress and sent to the President; and he has, in exercise of the powers vested in him by the Constitution, returned the appropriation bill to Congress, and stated his objections to signing it in a message which I hold in my hand.

Having examined the message from beginning to end I find no reference whatever to, and no single word of comment upon, the measures which are now brought again before the Senate in a separate form. They are not unimportant. They are of the gravest importance. They touch the question of personal liberty of the citizen; they touch questions of constitutional rights, the dearest and the closest to liberty-loving men; and yet the President has not seen fit to bestow upon them the cold respect of a passing notice, but simply to include them silently in his message of disapprobation and objection.

It may be that it is because of the incongruity in linking these measures with measures of general appropriation that the course of the Executive has been taken. Indeed that is the only inference to be derived from a perusal of his message. If it be so, if that is his only reason for not approving such measures as this, I can but regret, in justice to the office which he holds, that he did not so state explicitly. It was due to their merit and importance that their presence in the bill should have been recognized.

I am not here now to raise my voice for the first time in opposition to ingrafting matters of general legislation upon appropriation bills. Time and again I have vainly endeavored, in the long years in which I stood in the minority in this Chamber, to procure from the republican majority that overwhelmed us here, a recognition of the fact that such methods of legislation were irregular and vicious. Time and again, against my protest and earnest advocacy, I have seen the appropriation bills of Congress encumbered by measures of general legislation; nay, a portion of the very legislation, from the amendment and repeal of which the President has dissented, found its way upon the statute-book in the general appropriation bill of 1872, the identical measure which he now returns objected to for its alleged improper association.

Sir, it is too late in our history to suggest that it is proper or right or justifiable, that an appropriation bill or any other bills unobjectionable in themselves, but perhaps not wisely joined, should be vetoed because of their misassociation. I may say that there are no more important measures of general legislation now standing on the statute-book of this country, than those which have been placed there in the last fifteen years by the vehicles of general appropriation bills, and that no such thing ever occurred until now in American history, that the method of parliamentary proceeding, was made a cause for presidential criticism and rejection. The methods of parliamentary proceeding belong to the Houses themselves. The Constitution of the United States expressly provides that "each House may determine the rules of its own proceeding." Wise or not wise, the methods of legislation belong, and must belong, to each House for itself; and where they shall, as has been our custom from the foundation of the Government, create joint rules growing out of the comity necessary for legislation between the two Houses, the propriety of such rules is for the two Houses alone to consider, and is entirely outside of executive jurisdiction. It is a clear, unwarranted invasion of legislative right, for the executive branch of the Government to instruct them, or to comment in any way upon the methods of their legislation. Their rules are their own. Defective or perfect, they are their own, and there is no pretense, and there can be no pretense, for the just exercise of the executive power of veto, because of the irregularity or the unwisdom of the methods by which the two Houses have approached and concluded their work. It is to the substance of the measure and not its form, its merits and not its shape, that his discretion applies.

But I do not stand here now to speak of the incongruity of this legislation as it appeared upon the appropriation bills. If my counsel had been followed, if my vote could have controlled those with whom I act, there should be no such thing as incongruity in legislation. I hold it to be cumbersome and highly unscientific. I believe that each measure should stand or fall by its own merits, that a bad measure should not be carried by association with a good one, nor a good measure be endangered by association with a defective one; and therefore, I wish that it were in my power so to frame the rules of either House, that there should not be the misjoinder of general legislation upon appropriation bills, that properly are meant to supply the means to carry existing laws into effect; not that it is a violation of the Constitution, but that it leads to confusion, to uncertainty and embarrassment, not only of Senators and members who are to vote upon these measures, but likewise of the Executive branch who is to give or refuse his approval.

But we have passed the consideration of that subject now. This very message of the President sent in here on the 30th of April, known as his first veto message, itself recites the fact that—

The practice of tacking to appropriation bills measures not pertinent to such bills did not prevail until more than forty years after the adoption of the Constitution. It has become a common practice. All parties when in power have adopted it.

And he recommends that it be no longer followed whereby—

A valuable reform in the parliamentary practice of Congress would be accomplished.

Mr. President, I do not hold it to be within the prerogative or the duty of the executive branch. to supervise or instruct the legislative branch, in regard to what is or is not a valuable reform in parliamentary practice. The Constitution compels him by his oath to see that the laws are faithfully executed; but nowhere does it make him the censor morum of parliamentary practice or of the methods by which the two Houses shall reach their conclusions. It is one of the many, and one of the very serious misapprehensions, into which I think the present Executive has fallen in considering the scope of his official duty.

But, sir, let me pass to the consideration of the measure before the Senate, and which is made the more necessary by reason of the total failure of the Executive to give us reasons, or to return with objections, the bill which we have sent him, and which makes it necessary for those having charge of the legislative power of the country, to present these measures distinctly, so that the President himself, as well as the people of the United States, may comprehend what it is that we propose should be enacted into law, and what objections he can have under his constitutional duty, to such measures becoming laws.

I ask that the Secretary may read the two sections of the law of June 17, 1862, which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That, in addition to the existing causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, the following are hereby declared and established, namely: without duress and coercion to have taken up arms, or to have joined any insurrection and rebellion, against the United States; to have adhered to any rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person or persons whom the person giving such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe had joined, or was about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or had resisted, or was about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, and to have counseled and advised any person or persons to join any insurrection and rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That at each and every term of any court of the United States, the district attorney, or other person acting for and on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court in their discretion may require the clerk to tender to each and every person who may be summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror or venireman or talesman in said court, the following oath or affirmation, viz: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms, or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, had joined, or was about to join, said insurrection and rebellion, or had resisted, or was about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person or persons to join any rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person or persons declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

Mr. BAYARD. It is obvious, Mr. President, that this law, passed in 1862 while war was flagrant, was intended to prevent armed enemies of the Government, or those sympathizing with them, from obstructing the administration of justice. It remained upon the statute-book until 1871. Six years after the war had closed, the Congress of the United States passed "an act to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment," which had just then been adopted, "and for other purposes." By the fifth section of that act Congress legislated, as lawyers say, in pari materia. They passed another law upon the same subject, regulating it anew and providing other, and different, and as they then believed, more appropriate methods by which the purity of jury trials should be protected. In section 5 of this law—I read from the fifteenth page of volume 17 of the Statutes—it was provided:

SEC. 5. That no person shall be a grand or petit juror in any court of the United States upon any inquiry, hearing, or trial of any suit, proceeding, or prosecution based upon or arising under the provisions of this act who shall, in the judgment of the court, be in complicity with any such combination or conspiracy; and every such juror shall, before entering upon any such inquiry, hearing, or trial, take and subscribe an oath in open court that he has never, directly or indirectly, counseled, advised, or voluntarily aided any such combination or conspiracy; and each and every person who shall take this oath, and shall therein swear falsely, shall be guilty of perjury, and shall be subject to the pains and penalties declared against that crime.

Such was the law of 1871 which stands unrepealed to this day, and finds its present place in section 822 of the Revised Statutes. It will be observed, it is a law creating as to juries a class of persons to be disqualified and excluded; and in the same section of the act which I have read, it is further provided, in immediate sequence of the words which I have just read, and which, as I have said, are section 822 of the Revised Statutes:

And the first section of the act entitled "An act defining additional causes of challenge and prescribing an additional oath for grand and petit jurors in the United States courts," approved June 17, 1862, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

There is a double repeal, the repeal by implication in legislating in pari materia, and the express repeal of the first section of the act of 1862.

Now, it is a question of grave importance to the people of this country, to whom their laws are dear, laws which protect the life, the liberty, and property of every man in our midst—it is of vast importance to them to know, why it was that the repeal of this act, so expressly and affirmatively stated, was not made operative, because the fact, and the alarming fact, the shocking fact appears that the very section, the first section of the act of 1862, providing for this cause of disqualification and challenge was, in spite of that express repeal, deliberately inserted in the Revised Statutes in the edition of 1873, and there remains until this day. How came this? They have transplanted the first part of section 5 which contains this express clause of repeal into the Revised Statutes, and it appears as section 822. By what means, then, could it be, that a portion of the same section, that portion which contains the express repeal, should have been wholly disregarded, and the portion that creates new disqualifications, should find presence affirmatively in the revised code of the laws of the United States?

Sir, I make no personal imputation. I do not presume to say by whose fault or under whose supervision or whose hand this act of omission or commission was caused, but I do say it is an alarming fact that a law so full of powers, a law so full of dangers, of exclusions, and disabilities as this, should have found its way into the Revised Statutes in defiance of the express act of Congress declaring it to be repealed.

Sir, it is perfectly plain that, when Congress repealed the first section of the act of 1862, (now section 820 of the Revised Statutes,) which created the causes of disqualification and challenge, by every reasonable intendment they did also repeal section 821 which provided the machinery for making those causes effective. The expurgatory oath provided by section 821 could only have warrant because of the existence of section 820, which was the first section of the act of June 17, 1862. Section 820 was the foundation of 821; and when it was repealed, the rule necessarily applied, cessante ratione cessat et ipsa lex. There could be no application in law for section 821, nor warrant for the administration of that oath, when the causes which were to be proven by the oath of the juror himself, were no longer to be legal causes for his disqualification. It was an idle form to make a man swear to that which no longer was to be a cause of his exclusion from the jury-box; but so it is that section 820 has found its way upon the statute-book in this manner which I describe, but which I do not care to characterize. As was said by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] it was either an accident or it was a fraud. In my opinion there has not been, and there cannot be, a valid judgment entered in any court of the United States founded upon a verdict by a jury to whom it has been applied. Two late decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are to this effect, the case of Burt vs. Panjaud and the case of Atwood vs. Weens, both in error to the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Florida. Both affirm the position which I have stated; and the ground taken by the court there is, that it is as much a violation of the natural principles of justice and law to compel a man being a juror to disclose his guilt of a crime which would disqualify him, as it would be to compel a witness to do the same thing. It is a violation of the principles which underlie all just law, and which were wanting at the time of the enactment of this measure.

Now, Mr. President, the language employed in sections 820 and 821 is the same, ipsisimis verbis, as the law of June, 1862, and the Senate will perceive, that the clear and manifest mandate of the act of 1871, has been wholly disregarded by the codification of the Revised Statutes, and that a law now stands, by which ninety-nine out of every hundred of the white men of the Southern States otherwise capable of jury duty, are to be excluded from the jury-box, and that by reason of a law that has no warrant for its place upon the statute-book. Nor do I believe that property of any description would be held to pass under the judgment of a court obtained through the mediation and the employment of juries empaneled under operation of the Revised Statutes as they now exist. The history of that law of 1862, its repeal, its present dishonest and unlawful presence upon the statute-book, is, I hold, a blot upon our legislation which cannot too soon be removed.

Trial by jury has been declared to be the great end of all the complicated arrangements of civilized government. It was Lord Brougham who said that all the machinery of the British constitution and her laws, and the checks and balances of her power, had no other end than to bring twelve men in a jury-box. In the language of Littleton, when a fact is to be proved against a party it puts him "upon the country;" he "goes to the country," as it is termed, which means to his countrymen, not to those countrymen from whom the great body of intelligence, ability, and fitness have all been excluded, but to the good men and true of those who are his fellow-countrymen. Senators can well recollect for they have often heard the impressive formula of our common-law arraignment. When a man on trial for his life before a jury of his peers is asked how he will be tried, after he has declared himself not guilty, his answer is, "by God and my country." But what a mockery would it be when "the country" to which he is to appeal for his safe deliverance, is to contain nothing of the elements of intelligence, of justice, of good citizenship in which his best hopes of liberty and safety are reposed.

I scarcely believe the people of the United States living in the Northern States comprehend the cruel injustice, the wholesale and sweeping injustice, of this section 821. I scarcely believe that they comprehend the fact that this law as it now stands, and the repeal of which the President has refused thus far to approve, excludes every man who, even when he was a child capable of knowing right from wrong, ever intentionally gave the slightest assistance or rendered the smallest service to any one, who was in arms against the Government of the United States, or whom he may have believed had been or was about to be so employed.

Consider for a moment the absurdity and the anomaly of this oath. Congress has provided for the last ten years for a modified oath of office, which expressly exempts from such exclusive test oaths all men who themselves bore arms. It admits men to office who took part in the rebellion. They fill the highest offices of the Republic, and yet they cannot under these sections—820 and 821—serve as jurors. There have been and are now Cabinet officers, the chosen counselors of the Federal Executive, Senators and members of the House of Representatives by scores, ministers plenipotentiary to foreign governments, consuls and diplomatic agents perhaps by dozens, not one of whom could take the present oath to constitute him a juror.

Nay, in the very courts in which these oaths are to be prescribed, the district attorney who moves that they be administered, the very judge who makes the order permitting the administration, the very bailiff who hands the book to the proposed juror to be sworn, can none of them themselves take the oath now authorized by law. In thirteen States of this Union it would exclude ninety-nine out of every one hundred of the white citizens; and yet how idle and what a mockery it is to term such a trial by jury "a trial by the country," when the chiefest portion of that country's intelligence, its moral worth, its character, is all to be excluded from participation in such trial!

Sir, I can conceive no more palpable injustice, than the assaults which I have heard for years past in this Chamber upon the whole southern region of this country and its citizens because of alleged lawlessness; and yet while those charges and those assaults were made, the greater portion, the more influential portion, of those inhabitants, who might have restrained the commission of crime through the agency of honest juries, was excluded from having any such authority or influence.

These laws have by eminent judicial authority not simply been declared to be invalid because they compelled a man to testify to his own guilt, but they have been forcibly and truly declared to be as invalid and unconstitutional, to use the language of Mr. Justice Field in a late case, as it would be to quarter troops in the dwelling-house of a citizen in time of peace.

Mr. President, there needs no more to be done than to have these acts read and to recite the history of the attempts made for their repeal, to show that in fact those attempts have been unlawfully thwarted, to show the unlawful and unconstitutional character of the oath, to show their exclusiveness and injurious character in the administration of justice. All this is enough. If the statement of these facts, a calm and accurate statement of the history of these laws, cannot procure their repeal, or the desire for their repeal, in the mind of any fair and just man, then it seems to me that further argument would be useless.

But the jury system, the trial by jury, has always been considered and held one of the chief securities of personal liberty among English-speaking people. Before the adoption of the sixth amendment to the Constitution, while the original Constitution was under discussion before the people of the United States, one of its chief advocates and architects, Alexander Hamilton, in the eighty-third number of the Federalist declared that—

> The friends and adversaries of the plan of the convention, if they agree in nothing else, concur at least in the value they set upon the trial by jury.

And he goes on to state:

> Arbitrary impeachments, arbitrary methods of prosecuting pretended offenses, arbitrary punishments upon arbitrary convictions, have ever appeared to me the great engines of judicial despotism; and all these have relation to criminal proceedings. The trial by jury in criminal cases, aided by the habeas corpus act, seems therefore to be alone concerned in the question. And both of these are provided for, in the most ample manner, in the plan of the convention.

And yet the people of the United States were not satisfied. They still believed that further and other security should be given to them for that great bulwark of personal liberty, and the history of these first ten articles of amendment of the Constitution is well known, and never should be forgotten by Americans, because it was upon the faith that these articles were to be adopted, that the Constitution itself received the reluctant consent necessary to make it the supreme law for nine States.

The sixth article of the amendments provides that—

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Mr. President, the history of these amendments I have referred to. It is well known that they were limitations upon the power of the Federal Government. Juries they were to have, but the object was to secure, if words could secure it, "impartial juries of the district," and whoever was accused should not be tried outside of the district of his residence. An impartial jury is not only a debt to justice, but, as I say, it is expressly guaranteed to the citizen by the amendment which I have just read.

The bill now under consideration provides for the repeal of the invidious sections which contain this test oath and the right to administer it, and further provides for an impartial method of drawing jurors, or it makes the attempt, so far as the machinery of law can do it, to provide a method by which impartial juries shall be secured to every man put upon his trial in the United States courts.

Sir, I admit that the task is difficult. The sense of justice is one of the finest known to humanity, and it is also unfortunately one of the rarest, one most easily overthrown and disturbed. Under the present system and provision of the laws of the United States, it was intended that the methods of drawing juries, whether by lot or otherwise, followed in the various States, should be adopted, so far as the same was practicable, in the courts of the United States. But that has been almost wholly disregarded and overruled. There is scarcely a State known to me in which there is more than a mere semblance, in the methods employed by the United States judges and marshals in drawing juries, to those followed in the States. I believe it may be safely stated as a general fact, that the United States marshals in the United States, all over the country, can select just whom they please to serve upon the juries. I know that is the case and always has been the case within my memory in the State where I live. I hear the same fact stated all around me, that virtually the juries who are to try men in the United States courts depend upon the personal selection of the United States marshal.

When the Senate will reflect upon the fact, that the great body of criminal offenses now to be tried in the United States courts, are political in their nature, they will see the obvious necessity that the summoning of juries all of the same political party, is manifestly and cruelly unjust. That party spirit from which none of us are free, that party spirit which animates men more when they are brought together, all thinking the same way, renders justice almost impossible of attainment.

Mr. President, I would say, and I commend it to the thoughtfulness of all men, that there is nothing so dangerous and fatal to the permanence and stability of government as the disbelief of its people in its honesty and justice. I believe that if the Government is to be undermined, it is to be undermined in the hearts and minds of its people, and that when the mass of the American people shall come to look upon the machinery of their courts with disrespect, to believe that justice and honor and truth are not to be found there, then we may look—not for obedience to law, not for fidelity to the Government,—but for every method by which men may escape its obligations and its injustice. I could also bear witness to the effect, in the minds of the community, of the constant system of summoning partisan jurors until the disbelief in any judgment, or in any verdict, made the man convicted a martyr, a martyr to injustice, and not the object of just and proper punishment.

I will admit that it is unfortunate that the times in which we live, and the history of events which are known to us by the injustice that practically does arise under our present system, should make it necessary for the evil to be remedied by the suggestion of the existence of political affiliations in the commissioners by whom the juries are to be selected. I have been always bred to believe that the mention in courts of justice of party names or prejudice, the endeavor to excite them, nay, even the reference to their existence, was an impropriety and an insult to the tribunal professing to execute justice. Yet the fact is, and all men recognize the fact, that there are classes of cases in which the political opinions of the jurors who are to sit upon them becomes of the last importance to the person who is to be tried.

There are abundant cases touching the rights of property and sometimes the rights of a person, in which the intelligence and personal character of a juror, without any regard to his political affiliations is the chief thing to which men look in rejecting or selecting jurors to sit in a case. But, as I have said before, cognizance has been given by statute to the Federal courts, of a large body of cases chiefly political in their nature, and it is not reasonable, or just, or true that you can expect a jury, selected wholly from men of an adverse party, to give fair play to a culprit who has opposed their political passions and their political views. I, sir, am very sure that if I sat upon the bench with the power to accept or dismiss a panel of jurymen, and I was informed that men of one party alone, (and I care not which party,) composed that panel, I should insist upon their dismissal, and that a recognition of the general sentiment of the community, and of the personal character and the fitness of the jury, should be the controlling reason for their selection and not the fact that they were men banded together by the tie of political feeling.

We have recognized in many statutes the necessity of considering in this country the government by parties, as in the case of the selection of supervisors of election, from men of different parties, who are to be chosen by the judge who is authorized to select them. In all the States, so far as I know, and in many of which I speak with knowledge, it is provided by law that the judgeships of elections shall not all be filled by men of the same party, but that there shall be, for the obvious purpose of fair play and justice between man and man, a contribution of sentiment, of affiliation, and of sympathy to both sides of those questions that so excite the minds of men and tend to pervert their sense of justice.

I cannot, therefore, see how a question of this kind, when left to the fair sense of human honesty, to that love of fair play that the humblest as well as the best instructed recognizes, to simple justice, should not lead a man to wish that whoever was to be tried should be tried before an impartial jury. Give to your people confidence in your laws, and they will love and support them. Give to your people distrust in your laws and they will despise and evade them. The jury-box is the great school-house for the American citizen. The lessons of practical wisdom there learned from the close observance of men's affairs, the lessons of moral worth which an honest judge can diffuse throughout a community, form, in my judgment, an admirable school for the education of the American citizen. The jury-box is a place for good men and true who, under an oath combining the sanctions of religion and the sanctions of human laws, meet to perform the very highest duties of which the human heart or the human brain is capable, and that is, of administering justice between their fellow-creatures.

The importance, therefore, of this system, which we sometimes hear spoken of with disrespect, cannot be well overrated. Every safeguard should be thrown around it; and wherever it turns out in the practical history of events, no matter by what cause, that partiality and not impartiality is the result of an existing system, every effort should be made for its immediate reformation.

Mr. President, such a question as this soars far beyond mere party interest. Such a question as this touches interests far beyond the interests of this generation. Such a question as this touches the very fundamental rights upon which our Government is to stand and stand safely. I cannot imagine how any man professing fairness can say, that he objects to a system that can fairly represent the great political parties of the country in the juries of the country, or that he can wish to favor the continuance of a system that practically excludes members of a party, numbering much more than one-half of all the people of the United States, from participation in the execution of the laws of the country and the administration of public justice.

I have nothing more to say in recommendation of these things which seem to me to be self-evident. Testimony is here in abundance from all over this country, North and South, East and West, of the necessity of a remedy for the exclusive and partial method by which our juries are now drawn. This method proposes to have two commissioners, the clerk of the United States court, whoever he may be, and a citizen residing in the district in which the court is held "of good standing, and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong." They shall each place one name alternately in a box until that box, shall contain three hundred names of citizens fit for jury duty under the present qualifications, imposed by section 800 of the Revised Statutes. These qualifications are universal and equal, and provide for no discrimination against any class of citizens.

Now, I agree that there may here and there be found in the clerkship of a court of the United States a man almost colorless in politics. There may be such a man, but I doubt it. It is a very rare thing in the United States that a man, especially a man holding public office, has not political affiliations of one kind or the other. He may be more or less a partisan, but he still has party affiliations. Although the method proposed is not wholly satisfactory, nor do I believe that it will in every case reach the result which we desire, that two opposing minds upon the subject of party feeling shall have the selection of every jury, yet the provision is as near the securing of the desired impartiality that comes from having an even chance given to both sides to select their men, as any other that I think could be devised.

Then further, Mr. President, it will give to the republican commissioner and to the democratic commissioner the opportunity to go before the people and show what kind of men they propose to select for the administration of justice. The public will know if one man shall nominate, out of these three hundred names, one hundred and fifty persons of degraded character, and the other shall nominate one hundred and fifty men of intelligence and moral worth. Sir, the effect upon the man who has so maladministered his office will indeed be crushing. An honest public opinion, the great agent for the cure of our political evils, the great agency by which our laws are molded and our government ultimately controlled, will never sustain a man holding such an office who, shall so prostitute its powers as to secure corruption and partiality where the opposite qualities are so especially needed. If even one such bad man can be found on either side, there is the corrective to his action in the powers given to his co-commissioner.

Therefore, while on every ground, going into a court of justice I should wish to dismiss from my mind and dismiss from the minds of every juror and every witness as well as from the judge upon the bench all knowledge or all thought as to the political affiliation of the party whose rights were in controversy before them; yet at the same time I would secure that party against injustice and against partiality, by providing that, while he could not have twelve partisans of his own to protect him against the due administration of the law and the penalties which he had incurred, yet that he should not be a victim to political excitement, prejudice, and injustice which party and party passions so frequently bring upon those who are obnoxious.

The bill as proposed to be amended contains two other provisions:

> And no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, nor be compelled to serve as such juror more than two weeks at any term, unless it be necessary in order to complete the trial of a cause in which he may have been impaneled.

That provision finds its warrant in the experience of many of the State courts. It is meant for the convenience and protection of the farmers, of men of business, of men engaged in many professions, all of whom would be seriously injured if compelled to a prolonged attendance unlimited in time upon the courts. Therefore if a man gives, as every good citizen ought to give, a portion of his time to public affairs, this provision limits the time which he can be so required to give from his private business in any one year, and tends to prevent the continual employment of a set of men who may be called professional jurors. The experiment has been found to work well in practice elsewhere, and it is believed it will tend to give a rotation in service to all the citizens of the States without inflicting great inconvenience upon any.

It is expressly provided also, that should a juror be drawn upon a cause of more than two weeks of prolonged trial he is not to be excused from service under such circumstances; so that in the orderly administration of justice no injury can accrue. In the first lines of the bill the compensation of jurors is fixed at $2.50. The present compensation is $3 per day. That compensation was fixed at the period of inflated prices in 1870; and it is considered that the pay of $2.50 is reasonable and fair at the present time, and at the present cost of living, especially as the mileage of jurors is allowed to remain undisturbed under the present law, which is five cents per mile each way to and from the home of the juror.

Mr. President, I do not know at this time that there is necessity for me to say anything more in support of this bill. I have explained its provisions and advocated its adoption. I trust that concurrence will be given to it. But as I have said before, the President of the United States has seen fit to return the bill in which these measures were incorporated, stating his objections to certain features, but making no objection to the measure which is now before the Senate; from which I argue, and I trust, that the present measure, reasonable and just and proper, as I believe it to be, will meet his approval. And yet it is in his power to withhold his approval; and I do not know that a majority of two-thirds of the two branches of Congress would be found to make it a law notwithstanding his dissent. I hold that the exercise of this veto power by the President is his own; that he is an independent branch of the Government, and that upon his own responsibility he may or may not approve a measure which has passed the two Houses of Congress by the constitutional majority.

For the exercise of his powers, he is responsible to the people of the country. He is responsible to the House of Representatives for any malfeasance in his office; and to them is given the power to impeach him, and the Senate, upon trial, to remove him, should they consider that his acts have brought him within the constitutional prohibition; but I am very clear that the checks and balances created by our Constitution do prohibit and are to prohibit any invasion of his just prerogatives; and no exigency, no sense of the abstract injustice or unwisdom of his action, should control me in approving or urging any course of irregularity in order to overcome what I believe to be the errors or the faults of his administration.

Equally unworthy and unwarranted would be any attempts at coercion of the Executive by Congress—and such suggestions are only weak and idle.

There would seem in his veto message of May 29 to be a desire on the part of the Executive to present himself to the public in an attitude of injured innocence—that he was the object of an attempted coercion by Congress. Thus he says:

> The objections to the practice of tacking general legislation to appropriation bills, especially when the object is to deprive a co-ordinate branch of the Government of its right to the free exercise of its own discretion and judgment touching such general legislation, were set forth in the special message in relation to House bill No. 1, &c.

How little warrant the Executive had for this statement and conclusion is best shown by his own words in his veto message of April 30, in which he says:

> The practice of tacking to appropriation bills measures not pertinent to such bills did not prevail until more than forty years after the adoption of the Constitution.

As the Constitution was adopted in March, 1789, it follows according to this statement that for half a century "the practice" of tacking has been followed. And in the last line the message says:

> It has become a common practice. All parties when in power have adopted it.

I deny that he has any justification for assuming or asserting that he was the object of coercion, or that he was intended to be placed under any duress by having general legislation sent to him as riders upon appropriation bills. On the Army appropriation bill of June, 1878, there was such a rider in the shape of the "posse comitatus" clause; but nothing was heard then of coercion, and the bill was properly and promptly signed.

Sir, it was not the duty nor the right of the Executive, to impeach the motives and conduct of the Senate and House of Representatives who voted for the appropriation bills at this session, in the shape in which he first received them. If tacking general legislation to appropriation bills be revolutionary or coercive, what shall be said of the Congress of 1866–'68, of which republican majority the Executive himself was a member, who never failed in a single case to pass appropriation bills which were not open to the objection which he now denounces so violently? I know not what part the present Executive took in the Army bill of 1867, which invaded the clear prerogative of President Johnson and stripped him of essential powers as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and actually prohibited his communication with that Army, excepting through channels designated by Congress in the appropriation bill in question.

Sir, if to tack general measures to appropriation bills is coercive and revolutionary, how can the President and his party face their record of the legislation for fifteen years prior to 1875? It will exhibit an unbroken series of the very methods of legislation they now so vehemently condemn. Sir, the Executive is not coerced; he has not been sought to be coerced. He is not bound to approve any bad measure because it is annexed to an appropriation bill; it can gain no force and acquire no new strength from such association. The charge, however, has served as a pretext for a partisan maneuver—an effort to place his political opponents in a false position before the country. It seems to me unworthy and illy fitted for the great office from which it emanated.

Sir, the only coercion I would apply is that of a quickened conscience, based upon a comprehension of the real duties of the great office he holds, the coercion of public opinion demanding great motives from men in high places. It is the coercion of his oath to obey the Constitution, and not the behests of party, or the commands of those who have never heretofore treated him with even ordinary respect.

I have said before, that a veto based upon an executive criticism of parliamentary methods, was unknown in the history of our Government, and I do not care to repeat what I have said upon that subject. No one would accuse Alexander Hamilton of a lack of desire to maintain the just prerogatives of the Federal Government and of every branch thereof; but in the sketch that he has given of his belief why those powers were created and vested in the Executive, there will be found no justification, in my opinion, for the veto which accompanied the bill, a portion of which it is proposed now, separately, to re-enact and submit for the executive approval.

The primary inducement—

Says Hamilton in the seventy-third number of the Federalist—

The primary inducement to conferring the power in question upon the Executive, is to enable him to defend himself: the secondary is to increase the chances in favor of the community against the passing of bad laws, through haste, inadvertence, or design.

Now, sir, I apprehend it would scarcely be suggested that there is anything in the bill now before the Senate that can, however remote, be tortured into an assault upon the Executive or his power. It relates, as I have shown, wholly to the administration of justice by the people and for the people in their primary capacity. Is this a bad measure? Has it been suggested through haste, inadvertence, or design? Why, Mr. President, the feeling, the motive that urges this bill, is the growing sentiment of the American people in favor of a restoration of the methods of peace, of law, of voluntary action as opposed to military violence. The sentiment which produced this bill did not grow up in a day; it was not born in a moment; it has been a steady, sometimes as I have thought very slow, but a certain, outgrowth of popular opinion. I hold that the whole course of reformation which these measures illustrate is the sober second thought of the American people. It is their deliberate judgment that such reforms should take place. The legislation now proposed is in the direct line of the return of our Government to the principles, the doctrines, the methods which were intended to control it, and which I hold to be necessary for the happiness and welfare of our people.

I hold that the invasion of one department of the Government by another is utterly unwarranted, is dangerous, and strictly should be guarded against. Where they differ, as they oftentimes will, in what spirit must the high powers with which they all are respectively vested be exercised? It must be a spirit of comity, it must be a spirit of mutual accommodation; it cannot be a spirit of obstruction. I hold that no spirit but that of high public duty should actuate any man possessed of public power; that personal exasperation, official bickering, partisan revenges and maneuvers, have no just place in the execution of the trust of public power wherever it may be placed.

How much of obstructiveness, or of a desire for political maneuver, of cunning and partisan advantage, or of seeking to place political opponents in false positions, may be found to characterize the late acts of the Executive I do not propose now to state. The American people will read these messages, and consider the nature of the measures proposed, and they will judge the Executive and his party according to their works.

I doubt whether ever before in the history of this Government veto messages were found containing quotations from the debates in Congress, and oftentimes garbled quotations, calculated to mislead as to the position of political adversaries, and constituting the bulk of the presidential comment upon legislative action.

I recognize very plainly the peculiar position of our public affairs. Ordinarily the same public sentiment that creates a majority in the two Houses of Congress also creates an Executive in accord with it. There may be an interregnum, a change in popular opinion, in which, for instance, the power of the Senate, as a more continuing body, may remain, although popular opinion may have changed the majority of the House of Representatives. Their terms of office, the frequency of election of members of the House, and the comparative infrequency of the election of Senators render such things possible; and there may occur (and properly and lawfully) an Executive differing in political affiliations with the majority of either House of Congress.

But we do know, at least those who compose the majority of the Senate and of the House do know, and we do believe, that the sentiment which caused the election of a democratic majority of the present Senate and House of Representatives also elected a democratic President. Right down in the hearts of every man composing the majority in either branch of Congress lies the solemn belief that would induce him to walk readily to that desk and with uplifted hand, or his hand upon the Holy Book, swear that he believes that the individual who now holds the executive office was not elected to it by the votes of the American people, but that he holds an office justly belonging to another.

I have nothing to say in referring to the history of the events of 1877, when having a single eye to the welfare of the American people, believing in the necessity for the existence and support of a government of laws, believing that it was better, rather than that strife and confusion should throw this Government into the hands of the body of men, who stood only too ready to clutch it by the throat and put it under the mailed hand of armed power—we proposed and preferred that the forms of law should be created, should be followed, even though the gravest disappointment arose, and we believe that the result was the overthrow of the will of the American people expressed at the polls.

Those are the facts, and I believe history will record them as beyond dispute. Such was the honor of those who did maintain this ground in a period of profound excitement, in a period when they were convinced of the grossest injustice, who did believe that the public opinion of the American people would in the end be a safer refuge than the rush to arms for the purpose of vindicating a clear right. Upon that faith we have rested, "that truth was omnipotent and that public justice was certain." On that we stood then and on that we stand now, and upon that great issue the American people will be called upon at a day not long distant to decide.

But these facts only conduce to what? They render our situation even more difficult and trying. The Congress of the United States have their duties. They are endeavoring to execute them faithfully and well. They are endeavoring to shape legislation in accordance with public sentiment, so that this country shall be free, and safe, and prosperous, and happy, that the Union shall be perfectly and really restored, that the public credit shall be guarded and maintained, that all the functions of this great Government shall be duly exercised, and proceed properly in their execution. That is our great wish; but if there is in our propositions of themselves anything wrong, if they are unwise instead of being wise, if they are unpatriotic instead of being patriotic, we have the opinion and conscience of the American people to appeal to. All that I would ask is that they may clearly comprehend the issues which lie before them. It is upon their intelligence, their sense of virtue, it is upon their capacity to comprehend aright, and distinguish between the just and the unjust, that we form our chief hopes.

But, sir, suppose in these efforts we meet obstruction, suppose in these efforts we meet the interposition of the constitutional powers of the Executive, and he stands in the way and says with or without reason, "I execute this power, I will taunt you, I will harass you, I will endeavor to inflame you and place you in a false position before your countrymen," what is our answer? That that may be his measure of duty, but thank God he cannot impose the measure of ours. Our responsibility and our sense of duty is measured only by ourselves, only by our own conscience.

This Government is placed, so far as the legislative power is concerned, in the hands of the majorities composed of the democratic members, and we propose to so conduct it, that the people of the country shall feel that honesty in the first place has marked every law, that the lobby that so long here infested the corridors of the Capitol and controlled the legislation, has been routed and put an end to, that the Treasury shall be protected, that every branch of the Government shall be amply supplied and maintained with vigor, economy, and justice. This is our proposition.

Our first duty is to continue this Government. Our first duty is to supply everything needful for the honor and welfare and protection of this Government and all of its people. Is our measure of that duty to be taught us by a hostile, a harassing, and an obstructive Executive? Sir, our measure of patriotic duty is not to be dictated by him. It is to be measured by the oath that we took to support this Government. It is to be measured by our own discretion as to what the safety and the welfare of the Government require at our hands.

Mr. President, I sometimes fear that this great complicated machinery of the civilized Government of a rich and populous country is not fully comprehended. It seems to me when I consider all the forms of property, they lie only in the shape of accumulated credits, where once what we called wealth meant nothing but cattle or arms or jewels, or the precious metals. The property of a civilized country is the creation of its laws, and is dependent for its existence on those laws. The great body of its property is its credit in all its forms, which only by the close observance of law and maintenance of order can retain their force and vitality and value. This country is no longer a mere collection of Indian villages, in which peace and war was a matter of every day's chance occurrence. Confusion in a government like ours, is pregnant with the deepest danger and with the greatest disaster and suffering. You cannot throw out of gear for one moment such complicated machinery without producing almost irremedial injury and widespread distress. Therefore, the man who idly talks about stopping supplies to the Government, or who disingenuously or dishonestly charges others with endeavoring to stop the supplies of the Government, either suggests a great public crime or he makes false accusation of one against his neighbor. I hold it to be the great mission of the organization called the democratic party to maintain this Government in all its parts, and under the limitation of its written charter of powers to protect it against all enemies, domestic as well as foreign, to prevent confusion from rushing in upon it and disturbing its orderly progress. I do not hold it to be in the power of any Executive, unfriendly and unjust as he may be to the principles and the objects, and to the personnel of that organization, to lessen or alter its measure of duty, or place it in a false position before the American people.

If I did not believe that party was to be trusted I would not belong to it. If I did not believe that the credit, the safety, the welfare, and honor of the American people were safe in its hands I would abandon it. But shall it be that an officer accidentally vested, and vested, as I have said, against our belief of right, with the enormous powers which have accumulated and grown around the executive office, shall succeed in placing this great party, with all its patriotic objects and intents, in a position of suspicion and doubt before their fellow-countrymen? Ah, sir, it will require two to make up that issue. It is a false, dishonest, untruthful, disingenuous attempt to slander his neighbors. No, sir, this Government shall move on. It shall be supplied regularly and fully. We will put an end to political jobbery wherever it appears; we will reform all the wrong and injustice that are caused by bad laws that we may; we will supply everything needful for the strong, vigorous, just exercise of every constitutional power in every branch of the public service, and we do not mean that any obstructive Executive, any unfair political opponent occupying power against our belief of right but to which we submit under the forms of law, shall pervert the truth or raise false issues between us and our countrymen.

Therefore it is that I have said this much, and it may save me the trouble of repeating it again. I have said it in connection with a measure to which the Executive has returned no objection. I cannot imagine that there will be objection to it. I do not mean to say that there can be none manufactured—for when there is a will, a way will always be found for anything—I will not say that men's minds may not be so constituted. or so controlled by their prejudices and passions, that they may not find good reasons exactly in the opposite direction from those I have endeavored to state. But what I ask, and all that I ask, is that the issues now forming between the two Houses of Congress as represented by their dominant majorities, and the executive branch of the Government may be plainly, and clearly, and fairly understood by our fellow-countrymen, because when they are so understood by them, I am satisfied they will find reason only for renewed confidence and increased respect for the party, whose motives have been so unjustly called in question, in regard to the grant of supplies for the support of our Government, and who are honestly seeking to reform abuses, and redress the actual grievances of the American people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the text of the bill, which I suppose I must do now probably, as the amendment of the committee is a motion to strike out the whole of it. I move to strike out the last three words in line 3, being "and eight hundred," and in line 4 the words "and twenty-one," and then make the word "sections" in line 3 to read "section," and the word "are" in line 5 to read "is;" as to make the bill read:

That section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I should like to take the yeas and nays if it is agreeable.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired on this question with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. RANDOLPH, (when his name was called.) I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. WINDOM'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is absent from the city, under the appointment of the President of the Senate as one of the Board of Visitors to West Point. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] and would vote "yea" if he were present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. On this particular vote I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] who is obliged to be absent from the Chamber.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Colorado who sits next to me [Mr. TELLER] is paired with some Senator on the other side; but I do not know the name of the Senator with whom he is paired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The announcement was made of his pair with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Colorado would vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent as one of the Board of Visitors at Annapolis and is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WITHERS. My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SAUNDERS. My colleague [Mr. PADDOCK] left the Chamber, as he is ill to-day. If he were here, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. VANCE. I desire to announce that a number of Senators are absent in the Committee on Privileges and Elections engaged in the public business of the Senate, and they are not able to be here.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and is absent from the Senate Chamber in discharge of the duties of that committee. He would vote "yea," if present.

Mr. GROOME. I would state that I made a pair a few days ago with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] until my return from a temporary absence. Inasmuch as I have not had an opportunity to notify the Senator from Kansas of my return, and as he is absent from the Senate, I shall not vote. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. PENDLETON, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted "nay," forgetting for the moment that I was paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] on all political questions. I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by adding thereto the following as section 2:

SEC. 2. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to inquire if the amendment is not divisible? Can it not be divided at the word "servitude?"

Mr. GARLAND. Is it in order to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an amendment in the second degree now, and another amendment is not admissible.

Mr. GARLAND. I wanted to make a motion to strike out the words "or of any State" in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is in the second degree now, and in the opinion of the Chair it is not amendable.

Mr. THURMAN, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) As I heard the amendment read the last time, it undertakes to regulate juries in the State courts. I should like my friend from Vermont to point out under what provision of the Constitution he proposes that Congress shall regulate juries in the State courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senate has decided that we can regulate health; I do not know why we cannot regulate justice.

Mr. THURMAN. If the only reason the Senator has to give is that it comes under the commercial power of Congress, I do not know under what provision of the Constitution it can come.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment of the committee is a trading amendment; that comes under the commercial clause fixing the politics of juries. I think it falls clearly within that clause of the Constitution.

Mr. THURMAN. My question was put in perfect good faith and in all seriousness. This is the answer the Senator gives to it. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then let us vote.

Mr. HOUSTON. I withdraw the suggestion I made as to dividing the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Vermont leaves the amendment in a way that compels everybody, I think, who does not read the Constitution with his spectacles, to vote against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right; only vote.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I wish to say that I should cordially vote for the amendment if it intended to accomplish what I suppose the Senator from Vermont proposes to accomplish—that is, if it provided that persons qualified by law to serve on juries shall not be rejected because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Very clearly they ought not to be rejected for any such cause; that is admitted everywhere. If the object of the Senator is to insert something which he thinks will otherwise prevent us from voting for it, and thus make it appear on record that we are voting against the race and color provision, I think it is unfair.

Now, let us deal fairly in this matter. We do not think that Congress has a right to prescribe the qualifications of jurors in a State. We think that belongs to the State. I presume the Senator from Vermont thinks the same thing. We do not think Congress has the right to prescribe a severe penalty because somebody does not comply with the laws of a State in relation to summoning jurors. I do not think it is fair for the Senator to present an amendment apparently for one object and then incorporate into it a little provision which he thinks will prevent us under our views of the Constitution from voting for it, and make it appear that we voted against it for the other reason. I say if the Senator will strike out the words "or of any State," we will cheerfully vote for the amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. I will not.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will.

Mr. WHYTE. I will not.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will vote for it, if I understand it. If the object of the Senator from Vermont is to fairly say that no man shall be excluded from the jury-box of the Federal courts who is qualified by law to serve on a jury, I agree with him.

Mr. BECK. Is not that the law now?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I think it is the law now, and I think the amendment is a solecism, because it says if any person is qualified by law he shall not be disqualified. Disqualified how? What do you mean? No person shall be disqualified who is qualified! I think that is a solecism. If he means that nobody shall be rejected from service on a jury who is qualified, I can understand him. What he means by saying no person shall be disqualified who is qualified by law I confess I do not understand. But I think in this Chamber we ought to deal perfectly fairly. We ought not to undertake to interfere with the constitutional prerogatives of a State, and I do not think it is fair to interject something in the amendment that does interfere with the prerogatives of a State to force us to vote against what we are otherwise willing to vote for for the purpose of making a false issue.

Mr. EATON. If my friend will permit me, I will simply suggest that in my judgment it is not quite worth our while to undertake to perfect the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. I think the best thing we can do is to vote it down.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I would deal perfectly fairly; I am willing to vote for it if it is put in a proper form.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me a moment? He says, and I agree with him, that we ought to understand each other fairly. I am not sure that I caught all the Senator's words; but he said if the words "or of any State" were stricken out, "we," to use his expression, would vote for the amendment. May I understand that if the amendment is so modified as to confine it to the national courts, the Senators on that side of the Chamber will vote for it?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not speak for anybody but myself. If I used the word "we," I meant "I."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was merely editorial.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator used the royal pronoun "we." It has been said nobody was authorized to use that word except editors, emperors, and men of another class whom I forbear to denote by name.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I tell my friend from New York that I did not intend to usurp any unusual authority. I am speaking for myself and for myself alone. I will say now, and I meant to say "I," if the object of the Senator from Vermont is simply to provide that a man shall not be disqualified from service on a jury in the Federal courts who is otherwise qualified, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, I am with him.

Mr. THURMAN. But he is not disqualified now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. But he is not disqualified, and therefore I do not see what the amendment of the Senator from Vermont means; and hence I shall vote against it.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely desire to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that section 800 of the Revised Statutes provides the qualifications for jurors in the courts of the United States. I will read it:

> Jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each State respectively, shall have the same qualifications, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, and be entitled to the same exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law in such State may have and be entitled to at the time when such jurors for service in the courts of the United States are summoned; and they shall be designated by ballot, &c.

The qualifications of jurors of the courts of the United States are universally the same; there is no discrimination. There can be no discrimination made except in that individual voluntary choice which may include one man and exclude another.

The present amendment goes far beyond and proposes to control the qualifications for jurors in the several States, but there is no necessity whatever for declaring that the jurors of the United States courts shall be entitled to one provision of the Constitution of the United States more than all the others. There is no suggestion that there is discrimination made against them. I believe every man who hears me knows that in almost every State colored men have been summoned upon United States juries, and will be again whenever it is considered necessary or proper to summon them. I have seen them summoned upon juries of the United States in the State in which I live. I presume they are summoned on such juries in New York, at least I have seen it so stated—I never saw a jury in that State—and so on throughout all the States. In the Southern States to-day, I apprehend a great many more colored men are summoned than whites.

Thus the object of the amendment—I will not say the object, but the effect of the amendment—is entirely unnecessary. The provision of the code now is an impartial provision, excluding discrimination; and therefore I hope that the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment to the amendment, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) For to-day I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] on certain questions connected with this bill. I do not know how he would vote on this particular amendment, and therefore I shall not vote.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea." I must apologize for voting the last time, for I was paired. It made no difference in the result, but I ought to have announced that I was paired. I voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) For the reason stated upon the last call of the roll, I shall not vote in the absence of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when Mr. HOAR's name was called.) I announce again the pair of my colleague [Mr. HOAR] with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. WITHERS, (when Mr. JOHNSTON's name was called.) I repeat the announcement I made on the other vote, that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. WINDOM's name was called.) I desire again to announce that my colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is absent at West Point, and is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] My colleague would vote "yea," if present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent and is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. PENDLETON. On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.]

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—14.

Bell,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Saunders.
Chandler,	Ferry,	McMillan,
Conkling,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,

NAYS—26.

Lamar,	Vance,	Wallace,
Maxey,	Vest,	Whyte,

ABSENT—36.

Allison,	Carpenter,	Hoar,	Pendleton,

Butler,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sharon,
Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Morgan,	Teller,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hamlin,	Paddock,	Windom.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs again upon the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Georgia, whom I am unable at this moment to discover, I hope is near enough to come and redeem his promise.

Mr. KERNAN. My colleague will allow me to state that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is sitting, taking evidence, and the Senator from Georgia has just gone back to the committee-room.

Mr. CONKLING. I am sorry to hear that he went back, but I am in hopes he will come forward with that fluent enthusiasm of justice which often inspires him and vote for a part of this amendment, although he could not vote for it all, and bring up his colleagues and followers to support his good intentions. Therefore I renew the amendment of the Senator from Vermont so changed as to omit as they occur there the words reaching the State courts. If the Secretary will read the language I will make the change I wish to make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Striking out the words "or of any State."

Mr. CONKLING. Strike out "or of any State."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And add the rest of it, the penalty for violation.

Mr. CONKLING. The rest remains as it was offered before.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us hear it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

Mr. CONKLING. I heard the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] say a while ago that a sense of justice was one of the highest and at the same time, as he thought, one of the rarest with which men are endowed. I dissent entirely from the latter view; but seeing how highly the Senator from Delaware prizes a sense of justice, and having heard the distinguished presiding officer of this body [Mr. THURMAN] announce as his only objection to the amendment that it applied to State courts as well as national courts, thus disquieting his constitutional conscience, and having heard the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] who I was in hopes would have come in by this time, but by a "fortuitous combination of unforeseen contingencies" he is still absent, greatly to my regret—I will make it a point to send a page to the committee-room where my colleague thinks he can be found, to enable him, if he will, to come in and redeem his pledge—that distinguished absent Senator having indicated with some effusiveness of expression his willingness to observe this exalted sense of justice, which has been commended to us, by voting "yea" for the amendment, the State courts being omitted——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, entered the Chamber.

Mr. CONKLING. I have thus detained the Senate in a hope entertained, a hope which is now realized, namely, that the Senator from Georgia would return, as he has now done, in season to redeem his somewhat plural pledge (which he afterward confined to himself) to vote for so just a thing as this the moment that the constitutional difficulty was relieved—that constitutional scruple which has been so prominently illustrated and magnified of late in the Senate, as any legislative student can find by looking at the bills which have passed with so much democratic unanimity,—now that the amendment is offered (and I am saying this for the information of the Senator from Georgia who has just come in) with the words "or of any State" stricken out, so as to confine it wholly within the national, or, if the Senator prefers the term, the Federal jurisdiction. Knowing as I do his warm regard for a common humanity, his all-embracing kindness toward men, no matter of what color, race, or previous condition, I console myself for the moment and encourage myself with the hope that at least the Senator from Georgia will vote, as he has promised to do, for this amendment; and knowing as I do the distinguished station of that Senator in his party I cannot suppose that the other Senators of that party will suffer him to stand alone in isolated singularity in giving so just a vote. Therefore, I hope that we shall be able to borrow enough from the majority, adding their votes to the meager and feeble minority here, to carry this just provision into the bill if it is to become a law.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, as the Senator from New York, with his distinguished ability, has devoted so much attention to this matter, it has caused me to suspect that there is something in it that I did not notice. If it had been simply the proposition I supposed it was, there would have been no trouble at all with me about it, and there would have been no necessity for the Senator's long speech.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator will indulge me, I was compelled to make a long speech to give him time to get back into his seat, which I knew he was rushing to do as soon as the opportunity was afforded him of giving this vote which he wanted to give. I was merely amusing and diverting the Senate until the Senator got back to redeem his pledge; that is all.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will state, in justification of myself, that the Committee on Privileges and Elections is in session, and I have been in that committee, and going from that committee-room to this Chamber is a little troublesome.

By reference to the RECORD the Senator will find—and I have no doubt I can repeat almost the whole language that I used to the Senator from Vermont—I said that if the object of the Senator from Vermont was in good faith simply to provide that no person should be excluded from service on a jury who was otherwise qualified on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, I was with him; that I agreed to that; and I repeat it now.

I suggested to the Senator from Vermont one trouble in the way of the amendment, and that was that he made it apply not only to the Federal courts but to the State courts, and that was requiring us to vote for what we regarded as unconstitutional; and I wished that corrected. If the Senator had made any movement or indicated any sign that he would correct it, then I should have seen if there was any other objection to his proposition; but when he showed that he would not correct that, I did not know what the object of the amendment was.

Now, I will state to the Senator from New York that if he will say that in his judgment the law as it now stands in its application to the Federal courts excludes a man otherwise qualified from service on a jury on account of race, color, or previous condition, I will vote for the first clause of the amendment with a great deal of pleasure. Will the Senator from New York say that? Let us deal fairly with each other. I simply said that I would vote to exclude no man from the jury-box purely on account of race, color, or previous condition. That is my position, and that is all the position I have occupied. That is all I have said; that is the substance of what I am saying. I will vote for that; and I say so now; but is it necessary to re-enact it if it is already the law? Is it necessary to clog this bill with what is already the law; and is it necessary to clog it in order to put in these penalties which are wholly unnecessary.

I know the frankness of the Senator from New York; and, I will take his word for it, if he will say to the Senate in his place as a Senator that in his judgment the law as it now stands excludes a citizen otherwise qualified from the jury-box on account of his race, color, or previous condition, I will vote to cure the defect with a great deal of pleasure. If the Senator will not say that, then I take it for granted that what he proposes to enact by this amendment is already the law, and his amendment becomes unnecessary.

I had not looked at the matter; when I first heard the amendment of the Senator from Vermont read I had just come in from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I supposed that the whole idea of the Senator from Vermont was simply to secure equal privileges, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, and that I was ready to vote for. That I am still ready to vote for; but I do not propose to trifle with the statutes of the country or with the Senate by voting for what is already the law.

I wish it distinctly understood that I am perfectly willing to amend the law in any particular in which it is defective, where it does not give the citizens of this country, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, equal political and civil rights.

Mr. BAYARD. They have them now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understand that is the law already, and if so I do not see the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, with all the Senate knows of the versatility of the honorable Senator from Georgia, did ever the Senate witness such an exhibition as this? The honorable Senator declared his willingness to vote for an amendment but for one thing. Summoned from the Chamber by one of the manifold duties which press upon him, he was absent for a moment, and I rose in kindness to move the amendment so as to enable the Senator to do this good thing which he had promised to do. Now he comes in to requite my kindness how? By proposing to examine me for admission, I judge, to practice in the courts of the United States, or in some court. He proposes to interrogate me about the law generally as it stands now, and encourages me by saying that if I answer so that he can approve, he will approve of my amendment. What has that to do with the thing we were talking about?

Mr. President, let me say one serious word to the Senate and to the honorable Senator from Georgia. I understand this thing; so does he. The Senator from Georgia as much as any member of this body is an astute, penetrating politician. He knows the effect of things here and far beyond the inclosure of these galleries. The honorable Senator from Vermont offered an amendment intended to secure to black men the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution. The Senator from Georgia and those with him chose to vote down that amendment. That vote had at least the merit of consistency; but keen, quick and sleepless as the Senator from Georgia is, he said to himself, "We must not let this vote go unpalliated, unexplained; this vote without an antidote will be a poison in the public ear; it will show that with all our professions about equal rights and equality, in our sense of justice we do discriminate in respect of the right to sit on a jury between the man who is black and the man who is not."

Therefore with positive, with unqualified praise the honorable Senator from Georgia said, "let it not be supposed that we went against this"—and now I give his language very nearly—"because of the race, color, or previous condition provision in it; we vote against it only because it transcends the Constitution"—now I do not quote his words, but I state the substance of them—"because it extends to State courts, and what right have we to invade State courts? We have no objection to colored men sitting upon juries; we do not wish to deny or abridge their rights, but this is put in an unconstitutional form. We are compelled to vote for it all or against it all, and because of this ingredient which in our view impinges upon the Constitution we vote against it, but at the same time we"—because the honorable Senator did speak in the plural—"we would vote for it but for that." The distinguished Senator from Ohio had preceded him with a declaration nearly tantamount, more guarded—the honorable Senator shakes his head; he will not shake it if he listens to my whole statement—more guarded, but intended to convey the idea, as it did, that the only objection to the proposition which he saw fit to speak of was this constitutional objection.

Mr. President, had we stopped there I should have had some difficulty in understanding the Senator from Georgia. Without taking up the Constitution to read, I quote from recollection when I say that it forbids discrimination as well in respect of the States as of the United States; and lest some Senator may think I am wrong I will read the provision to show that the same Constitution and the same line and letters of the Constitution under which the honorable Senator from Georgia professed his willingness to vote for equality of juries in the national courts apply as well to the States:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State—> shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.
> No State—

In volume, in the number of words employed, three-quarters of that provision visits the States, is aimed at the States. Therefore it was somewhat difficult for me to understand, as it was on a previous occasion when the same thing was largely discussed in the Senate, the well-grounded distinction between a provision applicable to the United States and to men as citizens of the United States, and applicable to the States and to men as citizens of States.

However, I do not stop to join issue at that point of the argument. Suffice it to say that the honorable Senator from Georgia found in the Constitution or elsewhere reason to say that although this amendment was unexceptionable in so far as it applied to the national or the Federal courts, the objection to it was found in the fact that it applied to the State courts and to juries in the State courts as well; and he said, I repeat, that but for that objection it would receive not only his vote, but he said "we," (thereby meaning that regnant majority, of which he is so conspicuous an ornament,) "would vote for it."

He said that for a purpose; and I transcend no parliamentary rule which forbids denoting motives when I say that his purpose was to have the RECORD show, to have the country know, to have in his hand and in every democratic hand when we come to appear at the grand assizes of the people, that the democratic party stood ready to do just what we proposed to do, save and except only in respect of crossing the lines of the States and making regulations therein. That was his object; that was his purpose. That was the necessary effect of what the honorable Senator said.

Now, when the objection is cured, when the amendment is offered free from that, when it has been changed in exact accordance with the requirement of the Senator from Georgia, what does he say? After some not very slow-spoken words of dissent from his associates, which reached ears as far off as this, after the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] with that courage and truthfulness which always distinguish him and which enable him always to say what he means and to do what he says he will, had suggested with his long head as a caution to others that the safer thing to do was not to parley with this amendment, not to undertake to perfect it, to use his phrase, but to vote it down, and after some other such light had broken in, the honorable Senator from Georgia rises to say, first, that this was an off-hand expression of his, one of those unguarded things so characteristic of a man trained as he has been for a quarter of a century in all the arts and dexterities and cautions of controversy; that it was a spontaneous, exuberant, off-hand, inadvertent expression, in short, for which no man should be held to account—one of those idle words not to be brought into judgment in any human forum.

Suppose we had not put the Senator to the test, and this declaration had stood upon the record and gone out and been trumpeted hereafter, would it then have been treated as an idle, inadvertent declaration, made not because he meant to make it, but because he did not; not because he understood what he was talking about, but because he did not understand what he was talking about? Is that the way in which it would have appeared? Oh, no. When the hills and the vales of Pennsylvania had been made to ring by the distinguished Senator who now presides [Mr. WALLACE in the chair] what a figure this would have cut! Here stood the whole democratic party ready, willing, anxious to go forward with a bound and do complete justice; but this artful, contriving, perverse Senator from Vermont managed to fabricate an amendment and to put into it by dint of two or three words so much vice, so much offense against the Constitution, that even these ardent democrats, gushing with the milk of human kindness, ruled by a sense of justice and equity, longing for opportunities to do justice to the black man, and especially the Senator from Georgia panting as he was to show that no past relations left surviving prejudice, were debarred, cut off, ruthlessly disappointed in this laudable endeavor by the perverse, bedeviled phraseology of the honorable Senator from Vermont! How the democratic heart would have palpitated with sympathy for the predicament of these Senators! What indignation would have been felt that somebody did not rise and give them an opportunity of doing what they were trying to do all the time, "in season and out of season," to crown this race with citizenship, to give them every opportunity, and to break down all the barriers by which man trips up and overthrows man in fairly fighting the battle of life!

Oh, Mr. President, we all understand what this means. I am not going to attempt to hold the honorable Senator from Georgia to his agreement. It is not an agreement that is good within the statute of frauds. We cannot sue and recover upon it; we cannot file a bill for specific performance; it is not in writing; there is no consideration for it; no value was paid; it has not a revenue-stamp upon it (I believe the law does not require that now;) it is not an agreement which we can enforce. But still, as an admirer of the dash and courage of the Senator from Georgia, I did hope that when we had halved this amendment, when we had taken away from it a part and left only that which had been sanctified by his approval, we should at least have his vote in order that we might go out and say there was one democrat at all events, a distinguished democrat, and he from the empire State of the South, who was ready to stand up if need be alone, not as the black sheep but as the white sheep in his flock, and vote for a righteous amendment.

I hoped to enjoy that privilege. I feel discouraged. I think the honorable Senator from Georgia almost does not mean to vote as he said he thought he would, or as he thought he said he would. I begin to feel suspicious. In fact I feel so much discouraged that although I will not withdraw the amendment (I shall ask for the yeas and nays upon it) I will content myself as patiently as I possibly can.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I desire to say but one thing. I feel that I owe the Senate an apology. I thought, when I came in from the committee-room and heard the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, that there was something serious in this matter, and that perhaps the subject of giving equal privileges in the jury-box without regard to race or color needed some amendment. I supposed so; I took it for granted. I supposed the gentlemen meant so, but I discover now, with all due deference to the gentlemen, that they are trifling, either trifling with the Senate or making fun for the galleries, I take it; and I wash my hands of the matter and have nothing more to say.

Mr. THURMAN. It was either the younger Pitt or Fox who, when inquired of how he came to be so ready a debater, said it was because he spoke every day and on everything for the first three or four years that he served in Parliament. I think from what has been our experience, at least at this session, the Senator from New York has read that remark and has determined that he will be a ready debater too, if speaking often and on everything can make him so.

Mr. President, I think the Senate will be a little surprised when they hear that this amendment first offered by the Senator from Vermont and then offered, with some of its proportions curtailed, by the Senator from New York, was heard by me for the first time when it was read at the desk. We have a Judiciary Committee. The Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York are distinguished members of that committee. This bill was referred to that committee long ago. That committee considered it; they have made a report upon it; and now, while it is not parliamentary for me to say what took place in that committee, it is parliamentary for me to say that if this amendment was worth anything at all it was the duty of the members of that committee to submit it to the scrutiny of the committee before it made its report, and not let every member of that committee, except those who were in the secret, learn it for the first time when it was offered in the Senate. That is parliamentary to say and that is just to say. That is not all.

This bill reported by our Judiciary Committee is in totidem verbis the same provision that was in the bill which was sent to the President of the United States and vetoed by him, with one single exception, and that exception is that we have added to what was in that bill these words:

> Nor be compelled to serve as such juror more than two weeks at any term unless it be necessary in order to complete the trial of a cause in which he may have been impaneled.

With the exception of that addition, to which I imagine nobody objects, this bill is in totidem verbis the same provision that was in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which went to the President and was vetoed, and cut out of that bill.

That bill went to the President. Now, mark it, when that bill was under consideration in the Senate, where was this amendment? Why did not the Senator from Vermont move it then? Why did not the Senator from New York move it then? Why did not somebody say something about it then? But we had not one word from either of them upon this subject, and we had not one word from the President in his veto upon this subject. There was no complaint in that veto message, which was in detail on the bill which was sent to him. There was not a word of dissent from it in the President's message, not a word suggesting that there was any omission in the provision, much less that there was anything wrong in it.

Then after that veto, the bill of the Senator from Delaware is sent to the Judiciary Committee for what purpose? Why, sir, for consideration, that that committee might discharge its duty; and now, after it has discharged its duty and brought the subject of its consideration before the Senate, for the first time we hear this amendment.

I do say, Mr. President, that that is not the way in which the business of the Senate ought to be conducted. I am sorry to have to make these remarks; but I want fair play all around. I do not want anything sprung on me. I want to have time to consider it, and to consider it in the right place, and according to the proper modes of legislation.

But, sir, that is not all of it. How is this proposition brought in here? The Judiciary Committee reported a substitute as an amendment for the original bill. Nobody requested that the substitute should be treated as the bill itself, so as to be amendable in the second degree. The consequence is that this amendment of the Senator from New York cannot be amended, because that would be an amendment in the third degree. It has to be swallowed whole, or it has to be rejected. If it had been considered in committee, then it could have been amended; but now it is brought up here to call the yeas and nays upon it, and so we must take this proposition as a whole or reject it. Is that fair? Is that right? Is that justice? I say it is not.

Now, sir, I want to say a word or two upon this subject. The Senator from Georgia called on the Senator from New York and asked him the question, is there a single State in this Union in which a man is excluded from the jury-box on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude? What did the Senator from New York answer to that? He simply overwhelmed us with his eloquence; that is all. He spoke about nearly everything under the sky and in the bowels of the earth; he spoke from the circumference to the center of this globe; but he took care never to answer the question put by the Senator from Georgia to him. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] read the statute showing that there was no necessity for this thing at all, because the law as it now stands provides that jurors in the Federal courts shall have the same qualifications, and by implication no other, than those in the highest courts in the States. Therefore, unless it could be shown that men were rejected from the jury-box in some States by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, the law as it stands upon the statute-book effects all that could be asked.

But, Mr. President, the want of necessity for this amendment is not all. Let me call your attention to something else in this amendment to show how unnecessary it is:

> That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

I think it has already been shown that that is substantially what the law is now; but then it goes on:

> And any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

This is to be an amendment to the bill which is under consideration. What is the bill that is under consideration? The bill that is under consideration provides for drawing juries, by whom? By the clerk of the court, and by a jury commissioner who shall be of the principal political party opposed to that to which the clerk belongs; so that the effect will be, as the country is now divided in politics, that the two men who are to put the names in the jury-box alternately would be one republican and one democrat; it could not be otherwise; and now the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York think it necessary to place a fine as high as $5,000 upon their republican clerk or their republican commissioner if he fails to put the names of black men in the box.

Mr. CONKLING. Without respect to persons.

Mr. THURMAN. There are to be at least three hundred names in the box. There will be a republican commissioner or a republican clerk who will have the right to put one hundred and fifty names in the box, and it must be for fear that that republican will put nothing but the names of white men in the box that the Senators propose to fine him $5,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Why do you object to that?

Mr. THURMAN. If that republican will have regard to the rights of "American citizens of African descent," if he will scorn and despise this hatred of caste, as one of our friends in the Senate used to say, what in the name of Heaven is to prevent him from putting in the whole one hundred and fifty as black as the ace of spades if he has a love for that color? Where is the necessity of your $5,000 fine to make your republican commissioner put the names of colored men into the box?

Under all these circumstances I must say that although this looks like a very smart move, in my judgment it is not a smart move at all, and it is one that my friends will live to regret, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are almost scared out of it, now, Mr. President!

Mr. THURMAN. To be sure. I have no doubt if the Senator could withdraw the amendment he would withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire before the vote is taken to say a single word. I propose to vote against this amendment and I shall do it because it is entirely unnecessary. I wish to say that there is no need for Senators who have no colored people in their States to assume guardianship over them. I affirm that I have as much if not more regard for the rights of the colored man than the Senator from New York, or the Senator from Vermont, or any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber. A large portion of the people of my State are colored people. The Constitution and the laws protect them in sitting upon the juries of the country. This amendment is without effect in that respect, and does not protect nor secure the colored people in those rights. They are protected under section 800 of the Revised Statutes, and our laws, which require the selection of the juries to be made because of their intelligence and without discrimination, amply protect them.

I wished only to say that, sir. I repeat that the colored people of our States are, and always will be, protected against discrimination by the voluntary sentiment and the kindly disposition of the people of those States, and by the laws in force in them.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) As I have already announced, I shall not vote in the absence of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANDOLPH, (when his name was called.) I am paired, as I before indicated, with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. WINDOM'S name was called.) I will state again that my colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is absent at West Point as a Visitor there under the appointment of the President of the Senate. If he were here, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. I am paired to-day with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] I do not know how he would vote on this particular amendment. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BLAINE. My colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If my colleague were present, I am sure he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question again recurs on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out after the word "standing," in line 18, the following words:

And a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong.

So as to read:

Which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, of good standing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to ask the Senator from Vermont or the Senators on the other side, and I ask it purely for information, whether this is not the first appearance of a distinction of that kind in the statutes of the United States in regard to the jury system. I will ask the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee whether such a provision has ever yet appeared in the statutes of the United States relating to anything connected with the Judiciary Department.

Mr. THURMAN. There is such a provision in respect of elections, but I do not remember any case in regard to drawing a jury.

Mr. BLAINE. I know there is in respect to elections, in the political department of the Government. We understand that; but I ask whether this is not a new departure, whether it is not proposed distinctly to put into the judicial department of the Government the array of one political party against the other for the first time, parceling out jurymen on the same basis on which we hold a ward caucus or a ward election? That is the question I want the honorable Senator to answer.

Mr. THURMAN. I will answer it.

Mr. BLAINE. If it has appeared heretofore, of course this proposition would have some precedent to stand upon. With my limited knowledge of the statutes of the United States, this struck me as an innovation, as a new departure entirely. I know when in the political department of the Government the recognition was made in the statutes of States and of the United States that inspectors and officers of that kind should belong to different political parties, it was very seriously objected to as drawing a partisan distinction in the laws between citizens of the United States owing a common allegiance and having a common interest in the prosperity and welfare and destiny of the country. This seems to me to be an immense step forward.

Mr. DAWES. Or backward.

Mr. BLAINE. Or backward, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts well corrects me. It seems to be an immense step backward. More than that, you will have laid the basis of a great fraud. It may be made the basis of a common and an indecent cheat in selecting juries.

Mr. EATON. I beg pardon of the Senator for the interruption, but supposing it had been all cheat heretofore, had not we better have it?

Mr. BLAINE. Does the honorable Senator from Connecticut assume by that remark that it has been all cheat heretofore?

Mr. EATON. In some respects it has been too much so.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh; that is a tremendous modification already that the Senator makes in his seat. Now, I think, if he would rise and "make an effort" he would take back the other half of his assertion.

Mr. EATON. If my friend desires me to do so, I will rise.

Mr. BLAINE. I always like to see the Senator rise.

Mr. EATON. And I will say that there has been absolute and unqualified injustice practiced in many of the States of this Union with regard to the selection of jurors. If the Senator from Maine is not aware of that fact he ought to be aware of it. I am aware of it, and I believe every other Senator on this floor is.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not doubt it at all.

Mr. EATON. Therefore, in my judgment, the Judiciary Committee have done well in bringing in this bill in order to make this thing reasonably honest.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut to impute those frauds and wrongs that he says have been committed in the selection of jurors in this country to one party, or to the republican party? Do I understand the Senator from Connecticut to imply or to assert that?

Mr. EATON. It does not make any difference which party it was.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course I should prefer that we understand each other perfectly; and I should like to understand whether the honorable Senator meant that implication.

Mr. EATON. I so mean it.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; then we have that admission from the honorable Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators should address the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. I have got the Senator to avow that he meant that.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Maine allow me not to ask a question but to state a fact that I think is in point upon the very question that he is discussing?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course; I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish simply to state a fact. Some five or six years since, in the circuit court of the United States in the city of Memphis for the district of West Tennessee the grand and petit jurors had been named and summoned by the marshal, as had been the practice for many years in that court. It was found that every juror belonged to one political party. It was said by a number of persons that they had been approached and asked the question by the marshal, "If I put you on the jury will you find for the Government in all Government cases?" And in every instance where the citizen said he could not pledge himself to find otherwise than according to the fact and the law of the case as charged by the court he was rejected. Upon citizens stating those facts to the bar, upon the motion of a member of the bar reciting those facts, Judge Emmons, the judge of the circuit at that time, discharged every juror and made a panel himself and had it summoned and brought into court. But I give the fact to illustrate the practice that did obtain in that instance at least, where every juror summoned was a republican, summoned by a republican marshal.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator's case illustrates a great deal more strongly than I could have done by general argument the very fact that the corrective went along with the wrong. What does the honorable Senator establish by his statement except the fact that where the marshal steps outside of the line of duty the court will correct the wrong, upon the fact being made known, as the court did corrrect it in this case.

Mr. WHYTE. Then it depends on the court.

Mr. BLAINE. If the honorable Senator has made anything by that statement except that which reasons palpably and strongly against this movement, I fail to understand its significance.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I will suggest a good reason that I had for making the statement. It is very much better for the appointing power to select a fair, an impartial, and honest jury than to leave it to attorneys to appeal to the court to correct the errors of the appointing power.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator means to get a fair jury by having what the boys used to call "hull-gull a handful," a game of "odd and even," to select a rancorous partisan on his side and the other getting in a rancorous partisan on his side; and thus you will have the republican politicians of the ward, county, and district, and the democratic politicians of the ward, county, and district, and then you have secured a magnificent jury system.

Mr. DAWES. I want to ask the honorable Senator suppose there should be three parties.

Mr. BLAINE. That is just what I was coming to. I am glad my friend suggests it.

Mr. EATON. We can except Maine from it.

Mr. BLAINE. That is exactly the trouble in Maine. We have three parties down there; and up to the last year the minority party, "the principal opposing party" to which the honorable Senator from Ohio had reference when he drew this bill, was the democratic party; but the principal opposing party is now the greenback party, and hence there would be this difficulty. If such a law were in force in Maine it would exclude the democrats entirely from the jury-box.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will do it in Ohio next year.

Mr. BLAINE. Because the principal party opposed to the republicans is the greenback party in Maine. We threw at the last election 57,000 republican votes, the greenbackers 41,000, and the democrats came lagging behind with 27,000. Now, you cannot get under that provision a democrat into the jury-box by any fair administration of it according to the very way it has been explained and the way it has been illustrated. It was explained that it must be the two principal political parties. Then one fellow would drop in a name from his party, and, of course, to be even the other man would drop in one for his party, and if a fellow did not belong to any of "the healthy political organizations," as they used to say of the minority of republicans in this very body some twenty years ago—if he did not belong to any "healthy political organization" he could not get in the jury-box at all, just as Seward and John P. Hale and William Pitt Fessenden could not get on a committee here because they did not, in the opinion of such eminent patriots as Jefferson Davis and Judah P. Benjamin and John Slidell belong to any healthy political organization. Now you propose to transfer the policy of Benjamin and Davis and Slidell into the jury-box of the Federal courts throughout this country.

Mr. EATON. It cannot hurt it any.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator evidently believes it has not hurt it. He evidently believes that he is in a judicial ship and cannot be hurt by an Irish pilot on board striking it on all the rocks in the harbor. He proposes to try it in that way. I for one object. I object to this because it is a public indecency to put that in the statutes of the United States. It is a great public indecency to put it in the statutes of the United States that two partisans shall stand facing each other to select jurors for United States courts.

An honorable friend near me wants me to ask what are the two principal parties down in the State of Georgia—which is considered the principal party in Georgia. I know what one principal party is. I would like the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee to tell me what the other principal party in Georgia is, what is the principal party in those districts that think twenty-six hundred votes are enough to elect a Representative to Congress all on one side and that there is no need for anybody else to come out because there is such unanimity. Where is the other principal party there?

In these very States you are making this legislation to help, as you suggest, you meet with this particular evil.

More than that, there is another cheat that underlies this. There may be such a thing as appointing a commissioner who may be nominally with the other side and really in harmony with the man who makes the appointment, and then under this very contrivance instead of getting the nominal justice of having partisans of each side you may end in having the rank partisans of one side elect the whole panel. I am opposed to the proposition.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, the Senator asked me whether or not there was any precedent for this provision. I am advised that since 1867 in the State of Pennsylvania the juries are selected by jury commissioners, and the jury commissioners are elected——

Mr. BLAINE. I asked as to the Federal statutes. I asked the Senator distinctly whether in the Federal statutes—we are legislating in that regard, we are not legislating for the State of Pennsylvania, or Ohio, or Maine——

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly did not understand the Senator to so confine his inquiry.

Mr. BLAINE. I addressed my question entirely to that. I limited it to the field in which we are exercising our power.

Mr. THURMAN. I must say that I did not so understand it, and if this provision would be good in the State it would be good in the Federal judiciary. Now, I want to say that I am informed that since 1867 the jury commissioners in Pennsylvania—the men who select the juries—are elected by the people, but no voter can vote for more than one out of the number elected.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a very different issue from this.

Mr. THURMAN. No, it is not. In effect the jury commissioners there are necessarily of different political parties.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from Ohio thinks that a justification for the provision he has inserted in this bill, I have nothing to say.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill as it is now. The principle has been introduced into the election laws of having, as I understand, one supervisor of each party and, I suppose, that was done by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber with a view of producing a state of fairness and justice; and if it is just in the political operations of the country, I should like to know why it would be unjust as applied to the trial of causes in court. Admit that there are honest men in both and all parties; admit all that is required to be admitted; yet it can do no harm if it is a good principle to be introduced at all into any action of the Government, if in an election where justice is sought to be administered and accomplished, why not do the same justice here as far as the selection of jurors is concerned? There is a United States court now being held in Alabama, at Montgomery, and my information is that there is but a solitary democrat selected on the whole jury—a single one. It seems to me it cannot be worse if you divide the jurors politically. While the principle may not have been heretofore introduced into the judiciary, yet if it is good in elections, it may be resorted to in the judiciary. The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, I think, ought to be the last to object to the application of the principle hereafter their own legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to have the words proposed to be stricken out read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "standing," in line 18, to and including the word "belong," in line 20, as follows:

> And a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called.) There is apparently no doubt that this is a political question, and on it my colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, (when Mr. TELLER'S name was called.) I desire again to announce the pair of the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] He is paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] If the Senator from Colorado were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. WINDOM'S name was called.) I desire on this amendment to announce that my colleague, [Mr. WINDOM,] who is absent, is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to state again that my colleague [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] If present, my colleague would vote for this amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I desire to state that I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If he were here, I should vote "yea." My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] My colleague, if he were here, would vote "yea."

Mr. WITHERS. My colleague, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] is paired with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] My colleague, if present, would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Bell,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Saunders.
Booth,	Edmunds,	Logan,

ABSENT—28.

Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Platt,

Burnside,	Gordon,	McDonald,	Ransom,
Butler,	Grover,	McPherson,	Sharon,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Morgan,	Teller,
Carpenter,	Hoar,	Paddock,	Windom.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out from this amendment of the committee, from lines 22 to 27, beginning with the word "but," in line 22, and going down to and including the word "State," in line 22.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

> But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The object of this is to get rid of the cross-cut saw business, the pendulum methods of selecting jurors.

Mr. BLAINE. The object of that clause, as I interpreted it, was this: of course if you introduce politics into a jury you do into the judge, and if the judge, having political connections, finds himself outwitted on the original draw he will go and take this last resort in order that his side may have a better show. That was evidently put in for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I think it is put in for the purpose of producing uniformity, so that if there is any blessing in politics it may be universal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] or I should vote "yea." My colleague, [Mr. ANTHONY,] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] My colleague would vote "yea," if he were here.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would probably vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Allison,	Chandler,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Bell,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Rollins,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out from lines 28 to 31 all after the word "year" in line 28 to and including the word "impaneled" in line 31.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Nor be compelled to serve as such juror more than two weeks at any term, unless it be necessary in order to complete the trial of a cause in which he may have been impaneled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to strike out these words.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the committee as a substitute for the original bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS, (when the name of Mr. BAILEY was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. BAILEY] is detained from the Senate to-day by indisposition. If he were here, he would vote "yea" on this question.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAWES. My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. BURNSIDE. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY.] If he were present, I should vote "nay." My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HOUSTON. My colleague [Mr. MORGAN] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] as stated in the early part of the day. I have not repeated the announcement all the time, but I now state it again as I see others do so.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Bayard,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Voorhees,
Beck,	Harris,	Maxey,	Walker,
Call,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Wallace,

So the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I did not know the Chair was going to put the question on the third reading of the bill so quickly. I wish the Senate would allow this vote to be reconsidered and the bill to be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Ohio has complained of what he considered, from his point of view, sharp practice, withholding something in committee and offering it here, &c. I should be glad to have this committee have this bill and consider this question and a great many others that are in it. It will not delay it long. I make the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry that this matter cannot be fairly considered. The Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, has thought it within his province, not only as czar of the caucus, out of whose secret springs I suppose this contrivance came, but as czar of the Judiciary Committee, to deliver a somewhat caustic lecture to one or two of the humbler and less experienced members of that body for not having, as he says, offered a certain amendment in committee, and he says that he does not transgress any rule by declaring what was not done there. I, then, Mr. President, do not transgress any rule when I say some things at least that were not done there; and one of those things was to give the minority any fair-play at all, as I understand it. The minority of this committee never had the opportunity to set eyes upon this amendment except for a moment when it was suddenly produced, until within an hour of the time when it was finally disposed of in the committee.

When this bill went to the Committee on the Judiciary it was a bill of three lines which did not expose to the view of ordinary men how much out of some caucus or somewhere could come to change its character altogether. Those three lines were:

Be it enacted, &c., That sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The Senator from Ohio says this bill was in committee a good while and therefore that the Senator from New York and myself are guilty of a dereliction of duty toward the other gentlemen of the committee that we did not have our amendments prepared and brought forward for the consideration of the committee. Is that a fair statement, Mr. President? How could we know from those three lines, or from sections 820 and 821, what sort of a child was being conceived in the secret womb of a democratic caucus or in the brain of somebody who was to pocket it out at the last moment and transform the bill into this? If there is any way that we could know it, I should like to have it pointed out so that we can take wisdom hereafter.

Then the minority of that committee, as I say, did not have an hour when they could see with their own eyes what this proposition, contained in the amendment of the committee as a whole substitute for the bill, was. They could not have been ready to frame or propose amendments, and they were not ready. Amendments by way of striking out could have been thought of hastily, of course, and without time for research or study; but amendments of saving clauses to preserve the laws as they are now,—as the Senator from Georgia very correctly states that they are now so, but they will not be so when this bill passes,—required time to see what the state of the law was; and when it was discovered what the state of the law was, which (if I shall not be considered intrusive) I will suggest might be the proper duty of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, to have told the other members what the present state of the law was, and that there was on the statute-books of the United States, passed after the Revised Statutes and, therefore, overruling the State qualification as a mere qualification which the States can change at their pleasure, the very provision that I offered and which the Senate by a majority has voted down, and of course including the very provision that the Senator from New York offered, and which has also been voted down.

The trouble is not with the present state of the law; the trouble is with the design of this act by its repealing clause and by setting up a different and an exclusive qualification, whatever the States choose to make it or to have made it, both heretofore and hereafter, one which authorizes any State to make a qualification of jurors that shall depend upon race, color, or previous condition of servitude, not only for their own courts in spite of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States, but for the courts of the United States themselves, because this statute, very adroitly contrived, says that the test of qualification shall be that and no other, (inclusive and exclusive,) that the States have made or that they may choose to make the moment after this law is passed, and the courts of the United States shall follow that.

What becomes, then, of the provision of the act of 1875, passed after the Revised Statutes, which declares in the same terms that I offered this amendment, that no man, a citizen of the United States, shall be disqualified, excluded from his free and equal right with other citizens of serving as a juror in the Federal courts and in the courts of the States, or either, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. That is set aside, repealed. I cannot doubt it was the intention of that secret Vehme Gericht that rules the democratic party and that rules the two Houses of Congress, to do that thing, because I cannot suppose that my honorable and distinguished friend, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the king of the caucus—I cannot suppose that that committee of safety, or committee of advice, or committee of contrivance—by whatever name it is known among those who know it best—were ignorant of the statutes of the United States passed within four years. That is not a supposable case. No, Mr. President, if there has been any want of candor anywhere, it has been in our not having been informed in the Committee on the Judiciary what the present state of the law was, instead of our being forced afterward to hunt it up, and being informed that the purpose and effect of this statute was to cut out what a republican Congress has provided in favor of the equal rights of men.

Perhaps it will be accomplished, and perhaps it will not be. If it is accomplished, we shall know how and by what means it was done; that will be clear enough, and whoever assists in making this a law will assist it knowing that thereby he is undertaking (as the democratic party have so often promised that they will do) to sweep off from the statute-book one more, with all the rest, of the guarantees that the laws have set up in favor of the constitutional rights of American citizens, so that there shall not be, as has been so often said, in one or the other or both of these Houses, and elsewhere, a single line of that legislation, or of those constitutional amendments it may be, that have necessarily grown out of the new order of things which on paper and in the minds of the Congresses and the people that made them were intended to secure equal rights. There cannot be any doubt about that.

But, Mr. President, the secret tribunal has decided that this shall be done, so far as this body can do it, and it is about to be done. Now, let us see what it proposes to do.

Section 820, which it is proposed to repeal, was repealed when in 1871 a new provision upon the subject was substituted for it, and by one of those accidents that were frequent in respect of the revision of the statutes of the United States, the fact that it had been repealed was not discovered, and it got in again, those statutes having been passed without reading and without examination because there was not time to do it, as it was said; and at the last session of Congress this body in ample season passed a bill repealing section 820 over again, so as to get it out of the Revised Statutes into which it had got from an error. But a co-ordinate branch of the Government did not choose to act upon that bill; they did not choose to repeal it. Although I suppose I have a right to speak of a past Congress of the United States, I cannot presume that it was for the purpose of keeping it on the statute-book in order to give it a weight and influence over the next section, 821, which is a different section. If, however, that had been the purpose, then the purpose is accomplished, and we find the repeal of the two sections grouped together again in this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me remind the Senator that the House of Representatives had the bill of which he speaks before it seventy-four days of legislative session without action.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from New York reminds me that the bill to which I referred repealing section 820 was before that House for consideration seventy-four days. No man in all the majority there was found to move to take it up or to do anything with it, report it from a committee or wherever it stood.

Mr. CONKLING. And that, although republicans openly on the floor offered to vote for it or let it pass without opposition, as the record shows.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, what is section 821, which I suppose to be the section to which the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] alluded when he said—I believe I took down his very words—that it was one of the most infamous laws ever on the statute-book, which is a very strong statement and is especially strong coming from such a source? What is that most infamous law, a law it is true that was passed in the year 1862 by the votes of all the Senators in this body excepting six I believe? One of the gentlemen who voted in favor of it—I mention it although I was not then a member of this body but even the activity of the Judiciary Committee was not able to prevent me looking at the Journals since they could not go so fast as that fortunately under our rules—was then a respected Senator from the State of Kentucky, (Mr. Garrett Davis,) who was active for its passage as appears in the Journals. Six Senators of very intense sympathy with a certain state of—if it is not improper I will say rebellion that was going on, voted against it.

Mr. CONKLING. Take care of the "dying embers!"

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does it provide? It provides, as in all other cases at the common law that fall within the common-law principles, for a means through judicial inquiry and judgment of getting an impartial jury. That is what it provides; and in doing that, it provides that the court may in its discretion, just as at the common law it would hear a challenge for favor, (although this particular case that this statute covers would not always cover all the challenges for favor, for if it had, it would not have been necessary,) try and determine the fact whether any person called as a juror, who has been engaged in rebellion or insurrection against the United States, ought to be disqualified for sitting upon the trial of the particular cause or at the particular term under consideration.

Is there anything so very noble in insurrection and rebellion against the United States as to make it a clear case of qualification? Would it better satisfy the honorable Senator from Ohio and the Judiciary Committee and their associates and successors (if they are to have any, which I doubt) to say that no man shall ever be disqualified either on account of the past or any future rebellion from sitting in a particular cause where the question of the rightfulness or the wrongfulness of that rebellion may be the very thing that is to determine the verdict of the jurors? Or have we lived so long since "the dying embers" went out that it is a part of our mission now to encourage rebellion against the laws of the United States, and to say that hereafter, when the next rebellion or insurrection occurs we will take care now that there shall be no provision in the laws of the United States that shall keep the red-handed traitor off from the jury when his fellow-traitor is to be tried? Undoubtedly that must be the object.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it being now nearly a quarter after five, if the Senator from Vermont will give way, I will venture to ask that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow. The bill having been taken up to-day for the first time, no long consideration has been bestowed upon it. There are one or two other Senators who would like to say something about it. Nobody, I think, wishes to speak merely to take time or delay the final vote; but there are some Senators who would like to say something about the bill, I think. Therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Before that is done, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate some bills on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to that.

CHANGES OF SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879, which passed the Senate with amendments, and which amendments have been amended in the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the resolution be referred, with all the amendments, to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1989) relating to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The bill (H. R. No. 435) to correct the reading of "an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOUSTON. The bill of the House No. 435 simply corrects a mistake made in the name of a river that was ordered to be surveyed by the act of last session, and I should like to have the Senate pass it without any reference to a committee. The bill has in it the name of the river "Chattahoochee" instead of "Choctawhatchee," as it ought to be. The House have passed a bill correcting the name, and I should like to have the Senate act on the bill as it passed the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion was made to adjourn which was only waived for the purpose of laying these matters before the Senate. The Chair will say to the Senator from Alabama that the Chair can reserve this bill until the morning and when it is laid before the Senate in the morning hour he can ask for action.

Mr. HOUSTON. That will do just as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

SPECIAL POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. MAXEY. I desire to make a report from a committee. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to which was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 516) to extend the time of special postal service until service can be obtained by advertisement, recommend concurrence with the amendment of the House. I will state that the amendment of the House does not change in the slightest degree the point made in the bill itself.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We can look at it in the morning.

Mr. MAXEY. I shall call it up to-morrow. It is a mere verbal correction, which does not alter the bill in the slightest degree. I ask that the bill lie on the table with the report until to-morrow. I can call it up in the morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 14; and (at five o'clock and sixteen minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 5, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL DOMER, D. D., of St. Paul's Lutheran Church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. CONGER. Leave was granted yesterday in some instances for the withdrawal of papers from the files of the House. I did not notice that the Journal contained the statement that in those cases there had been no adverse reports. I do not know whether there was or was not an adverse report in any case, but the rule usually is not to allow the papers to be withdrawn in cases where there have been adverse reports.

The SPEAKER. The papers are generally examined to ascertain that fact.

Mr. CONGER. I know; but the Journal does not say that in the cases where leave was granted yesterday there was no adverse report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that that statement is not made in the Journal. It appears in the RECORD, and the Chair thinks it might as well be made in the Journal. It is the practice of the Chair never to allow papers to be withdrawn in cases where there have been adverse reports. An examination of the papers is made for the purpose of ascertaining that fact.

The Journal, as read, was then approved.

COASTS AND ISLANDS OF THE MEDITERRANEAN SEA.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth two volumes of sailing directions for the United States Hydrographic Office.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas the first and second volumes of a book entitled the Coasts and Islands of the Mediterranean Sea, published by the United States Hydrographic Office, have been bound in cloth, and the third and fourth volumes are now in course of preparation: Therefore,

Resolved, &c., That the Public Printer be, and hereby is, authorized to bind in cloth, for the United States Hydrographic Office, the third and fourth volumes of the edition of the book of sailing directions entitled Coasts and Islands of the Mediterranean Sea, published by the United States Hydrographic Office: Provided, That the difference in cost of the paper covers and cloth binding shall not exceed $200.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, from the same committee, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 1989) relating to printing impressions from portraits and vignettes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of a Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, the head of a Department or bureau, art association, or library, be, and he is hereby, authorized to furnish impressions from any portrait or vignette which is now, or may hereafter be, a part of the engraved stock of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, at such rates and under such conditions as he may deem necessary to protect the public interests.

The amendment was to strike out at the close of the bill the words, "at such rates and under such conditions as he may deem necessary to protect the public interests," and to insert in lieu thereof the words:

Provided, That the party or parties applying for the same shall deposit in advance with the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing the cost price of said portrait or vignettes and 10 per cent. additional.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "library," the words "and the postmaster at the Confedrit × Roads" as among those who may receive the benefit of this bill.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman has always some foolishness; I do not understand what he means. I do not propose to bandy words with the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. I think the idea of making this Government, through the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, a publishing house for members of Congress and others, to supply portraits to them at a profit, in order to bring money into the Treasury, is a very foolish affair.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. If the gentleman understood the matter a little better he would not make that remark. The proposition comes from your own side of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I do not care where it comes from.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Wait a moment. It simply allows those who wish these vignettes or portraits to get them by paying enough to indemnify the Government, just as you go now to the Government Printing Office and purchase such books as are printed there upon depositing the cost price and 10 per cent. additional; that is the whole of it.

Mr. CONGER. I understand that only a certain number of impressions can be taken from any kind of plates without wearing them out; and if the Government does not need these plates any longer, let them be sold to somebody who can make a little profit on them. I do not believe in the Government being a picture dealer.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I know the gentleman is great in small matters. I wish he would rise to something more important.

Mr. CONGER. Well, I think this bill was committed to the right person to report it to the House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. If the gentleman would employ his immense genius in something of more importance, I think it would be better for the country.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the Committee on Printing, it was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. CONGER, to insert after the word "Library" the words "and the postmaster at the Confedrit × Roads."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back, with a substitute, the bill known as the "Knott bill" for electing a Public Printer—House bill No. 2170, to provide for the election of a Congessional Printer, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. Is that a privileged report from the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet heard the bill read. If it creates a new office, it will go under the rules to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let points of order be reserved.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. Points of order will be reserved until the bill is read.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Senate shall elect some competent person, who shall be a practical printer, to take charge of and manage the Government Printing Office.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the person so elected shall be deemed an officer of the Senate and shall be designated "Congressional Printer." He shall superintend the printing and binding of the Journals and such other documents as shall be ordered by each House of Congress, and shall superintend the execution of all the printing and binding for the respective Departments of the Government now required by law to be executed at the Government Printing Office, and shall in all respects be governed by the laws in force in relation to the Public Printer and the execution of the printing and binding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act and the election of a Congressional Printer in pursuance thereof the office of Public Printer shall be abolished. And the salary of the said officer shall be at the rate of $3,600 a year.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That as soon as practicable after the election of said Congressional Printer he shall cause to be prepared a complete invoice of all the material, type, presses, leather, paper, utensils, fixtures, furniture, stock, horses, wagons, carriages, harnesses, and personal property of every description whatever under his charge belonging to the Government. Said invoice shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the Congressional Printer, reported to Congress, and printed; and thereafter, at the beginning of each fiscal year or as soon thereafter as practicable, he shall cause a new inventory of all of the said personal property then in his possession to be taken. Said inventory shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the Congressional Printer and published as a part of his annual report to Congress.

SEC. 5. This act to take effect from and after the date of its passage.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I should have said that this is the report of a majority of the Committee on Printing, not of the entire committee. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] dissents. I ask now that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether this is a privileged report from the Committee on Printing? It has no relation to printing any matter ordered by the House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It is too late now to raise that point.

Mr. CONGER. I made the point before the bill was read, and the Chair stated that he could not decide it until after the reading. I make the point that this is not such a report from the Committee on Printing as is privileged.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the reference of the measure to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would obviate that objection, from the fact that it goes to the Committee of the Whole for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill is liable to the point of order that it should be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I know that; but I make the point that under the rule this is not a privileged report from the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I obtained the consent of the House, as I understood, to make the report.

Mr. WEAVER. I make the point of order that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I make the other point first.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that this is not a privileged report in the sense contemplated by the rule; in other words, the Chair presumes the gentleman means that it does not come within the provisions of the rule giving the Committee on Printing the right to report at any time.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. This is not a new question. It has been decided by former Speakers. The Chair will cause to be read an extract from the Congressional Globe.

The Clerk read as follows:

Forty-second Congress, second session, April 9, 1872.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. BEATTY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, which is authorized to report at any time, to report for present consideration a bill to provide for the distribution of public documents.

The bill was read.

Mr. BEATTY. At the request of several members, I ask that the bill, instead of being put upon its passage now, be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that this bill does not belong to the class of reports which the Committee on Printing is authorized to make at any time. I am willing that it shall be printed and recommitted, but not that it shall be brought back again by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BEATTY. Then I insist on the bill being considered now.

The SPEAKER. This bill comes from the Committee on Printing, but it is not, therefore, a privileged report. The Committee on Printing is authorized to report at any time, but only upon matters of printing.

Mr. BEATTY. This is upon matters of printing, and is a substitute for two resolutions sent to the committee.

The SPEAKER. It does not follow because a resolution in the morning hour of Monday may be sent to the Committee on Printing that that carries with it the privilege of reporting at any time. In order to expedite the business of the House, the Committee on Printing is authorized to report at any time in matters of printing; but that does not carry with it the right of reporting matters which change the statute laws of the country. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Beatty] will see the distinction.

Mr. BEATTY. I do not know that this changes the law. It simply adds to the law.

The SPEAKER. When the Chair speaks of changing the law, he has reference to anything which is independent legislation. The distinction is obvious, of course, to the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BEATTY. The bill simply provides for publishing and distributing certain documents.

The SPEAKER. It is such a bill as might come from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, or from the Committee on the Judiciary, or from any one of several committees. It would come in as ordinary legislation from any of those committees, and it could not derive any kind of privilege from having been referred to the Committee on Printing. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Beatty] asks that this bill be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Printing, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BEATTY. Have I not the right to have the bill considered now?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not that right if the point of order is made on it, because he has not the right to report it as a privileged bill.

Mr. BEATTY. Will the Chair have the rule read which excludes this bill from the privileges accorded to the committee?

The SPEAKER. Rule 101 is that "it shall be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time." That has been always held to refer entirely to matters of printing.

Mr. BEATTY. And this is a matter of printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not seem to perceive the distinction. For instance, the Committee of Elections is authorized to report at any time; but a general bill regarding the time at which members of Congress shall be elected throughout the country would appropriately come from the Committee of Elections, but would not be a privileged report. They would have to report it when called. So, while the gentleman's committee is privileged to report on any order of the House in relation to printing, it is not privileged to report upon matters of general legislation at any time. The principle is not a new one; it has been uniformly held so.

Mr. BEATTY. Well, I am unable to see it, although it may be all right.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee of Elections of the last Congress always understood that to be the limit of our privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is not a new decision. It is the view which has always been taken, and one without which it would be impossible to proceed with the business of the House.

The bill (H. R. No. 2252) was then, by unanimous consent, read a first and second time, recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Some days thereafter the then Speaker, Mr. BLAINE, sought an opportunity to present an elaborate opinion on this point, from which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORTS OF PRINTING COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires the attention of the House to a matter concerning the rules of the House. He wishes the attention, if he can get it, of every member now in his seat.

The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Beatty, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, on the 9th of April reported the following bill, which the Chair directs to be now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A bill to provide for the distribution of public documents.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be printed of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1871 255,000 extra copies, and of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the same year 50,000 copies: Provided, That of the volumes hereby authorized 1,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be for the use of said Commissioner, and 500 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education shall be for the use of said Commissioner, and the remainder, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall be divided equally among the congressional districts and Territories of the United States; and the copies of said reports apportioned to each district shall be fairly subdivided among the several counties thereof, having due regard to the population of said counties, and the copies so apportioned to each county shall be sent to the postmaster of the county town of said county, and be charged to said postmaster on the books of the Post-Office Department.

"SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of each postmaster to whom these reports are sent to keep posted in a conspicuous place in his office a placard, which shall be furnished him by the Postmaster-General, on which shall be printed the title of all public documents said postmaster may receive for distribution, and the price of same, which price shall be ascertained by the Postmaster-General, and shall be the actual cost of paper, press-work, and binding, and shall be printed on the title-page of each volume, and also on its outside wrapper. The postmasters receiving said volumes shall furnish them at the price so fixed to all persons who may apply for them, and all moneys so received by the postmasters from the sales of books shall be accounted for to the Postmaster-General, and be by him paid into the Treasury of the United States.

"SEC. 3. That the said postmasters shall be required to make quarterly reports, on blanks to be furnished by the Postmaster-General, showing the number of volumes sold and the number unsold, and should the Postmaster-General find that at any post-office the supply is in excess of the demand he may order the transfer of such excess to other places where the demand is in excess of the supply.

"SEC. 4. That the Postmaster-General is authorized to allow such additional compensation to each postmaster as the increased receipts of his office resulting from the sale of public documents may entitle him to under existing law, and is hereby required to make annually to Congress a detailed report showing the number of volumes sold in each county, the total amount of receipts from sales, and the number of copies of each document on hand.

"SEC. 5. That all public documents hereafter printed in excess of the usual number by order of the two Houses of Congress shall show on the title-page of each copy its price, which price shall exclude the cost of composition, and shall cover, but not exceed, the actual cost of paper, press-work, and binding; and such a number of said reports as the two Houses of Congress may by concurrent resolution specifically direct shall be distributed, sold, and accounted for in the same manner as prescribed in the foregoing sections of this act for the distribution and sale of the reports on agriculture and education.

"SEC. 6. That each postmaster to whom public documents shall be forwarded for sale shall be responsible on his official bond for the faithful performance of all the duties required of him by this act."

The SPEAKER. When this bill was reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Beatty,] who is chairman of the Committee on Printing, authorized by the rules of the House to report at any time, the point of order was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the privileges of the Printing Committee did not extend to matters of general legislation of this kind; and the Chair sustained the point of order. The gentleman from Ohio did not concur with the views of the Chair, and took occasion to refer to the decision in a speech made in the House on Saturday, in which he differs very widely from the construction given to the rules by the Chair. The Joint Committee on Printing, as now constituted, came into being in the Thirtieth Congress from legislation that was agreed upon in the Twenty-ninth Congress. When the committee was appointed as now organized it soon found itself at an inconvenience in the matter of making reports upon the business of the House. Thereupon a member of the Committee on Printing, a very intelligent and industrious member of the House, Mr. Thomas J. Henley, a member from Indiana, asked consent that a rule should be adopted allowing the Committee on Printing to have leave to report at any time. The reason why Mr. Henley asked this will be explained by an extract from his remarks which the Chair directs to be read by the Clerk in the hearing of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. Henley wished to obtain the ear of the House for a moment, while he stated, in connection with this resolution, the fact that all questions referred to the Committee on Printing should be reported on immediately after they were referred and examined; if not, the consequence would frequently be a great loss to the Government, for when the documents were submitted to the House, before the committee had time to examine the question of printing, the usual number were ordered, printed, and before the committee had opportunity to report the composition might be distributed; and the consequence was, when the Committee on Printing afterward reported in favor of an extra number, the House were obliged to pay for additional composition. What he proposed was that the House should now adopt a rule, of which he had given previous notice, similar to that which was in force with reference to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and one other committee, at least, that it should be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time. It would not interfere with the business of the House, and would, as he had before said, save a large amount of money which would otherwise be paid for additional composition, when the matter had already been taken down.—Congressional Globe, volume 18, page 318, February 17, 1848."

The SPEAKER. It will be observed——

Mr. BEATTY. I would ask the Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs not to be interrupted.

Mr. BEATTY. I want to know the volume and page of the Globe.

The SPEAKER. That will appear in the remarks of the Chair as they shall be printed in the Globe. It will be observed that this remark of Mr. Henley, which was the only explanation given of the necessity for the rule, relates to the convenience of the Printing Committee with reference to the printing of the House; and that for the convenience of the House and for economy of the public work the committee should have the right to report at any time, as the Committee on Enrolled Bills have the right to report at any time. That has been the undoubted right of the committee. It is to the undoubted convenience and advantage of the House that the Committee on Printing should have the right to report at any time, just as for the necessity of legislation the Committee on Enrolled Bills should have the right to report at any time. And the gentleman from Indiana who introduced the rule likened the necessity to that of the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Several years afterward, in 1860, when an elaborate revision of the rules was made, which led to the present Digest by the journal clerk of the House of Representatives, the House directed that the rules in regard to the Committee on Printing and the Committee on Enrolled Bills should be embraced in the same rule; so that Rule 101 of the House says that the Committee on Printing and the Committee on Enrolled Bills have the right to report at any time. On what? What is it that the Committee on Enrolled Bills have the right to report at any time? Why, on enrolled bills. What is it that the Committee on Printing have the right to report at any time? Why, in regard to printing for the use of the House. Of necessity the rules confine it to that.

It will be observed that both the Committee on Enrolled Bills and the Committee on Printing are called on the regular call of committees for general legislation just as often as the Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Commerce, or any other important committee of the House is called. And then, when so called, any general legislation, such as the kind proposed by the bill which the Chair has directed to be read, is in order from that committee, if it has been referred to it, and should be confined to that call which is common to all committees, and is enjoyed by the Committee on Printing, as it is by all the other committees.

If, on the other hand, the privilege to report at any time should be construed by this House in the sense contended for by the present chairman of the committee, then the House may have bills embracing extraordinary legislation precipitated upon it without the slightest notice. The bill which the Chair has directed to be read is one of that character. Of course it is never the function of the Chair to discuss the expediency of proposed legislation; but he cannot refrain from directing the attention of the House to the fact that the bill upon which the gentleman made his point of the right to report at any time is one which would overturn the entire system of printing and distribution of public documents. It proposes to break up the long-established custom of distributing them among the members, and makes the Government Printing Office a vast wholesale and retail printing establishment, and every postmaster throughout the United States an agent of sale for that establishment. Now, the Chair does not undertake to say whether such a change would be expedient or not; but he is firmly convinced that it was never within the contemplation of the rules of the House that the right to report at any time, which the committee has and ought to have upon matters of printing, should be construed as embracing a measure of that kind, so that it could be reported at any time and instant action had upon it. For the House will further observe that the specific language of the rule is that the right of the committee to report at any time carries with it the right of the House to consider the measure when reported. Hence, should the construction contended for be maintained, it would give the Committee on Printing the right to interrupt and obstruct the business of the House with measures of general legislation, whereas Mr. Henley, who introduced the rule, stated in the remarks which the Chair directed to be read that the privilege asked for the committee was one limited in its nature, like that of the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and would not interfere with the business of the House.

Gentlemen of the House will please observe one other great abuse to which such a construction might lead. The rules are necessarily for the protection of minorities. It being established by many parliamentary decisions that a committee has the right to report back at some time whatever may be referred to it, and it being further established that the House can by a majority vote refer any bill on Monday morning, it will be seen that any bill belonging of right to the Committee on Commerce, or the Committee on the Judiciary, or the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Committee on Naval Affairs, or the Committee of Ways and Means, might by a majority vote be referred to the Committee on Printing; and if that committee have the right to report such legislation at any time, they may thrust in upon the House the next day, as soon as the Journal is read, a matter wholly disconnected with printing, wholly apart from their legitimate duties—in no manner or shape relating to the legitimate functions of that committee.

Inasmuch as the chairman of the committee conceived that the functions and rights of that committee were interfered with by the decision of the Chair upon the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair has felt it right that the House should have its attention called to the matter; because, if the ruling of the Chair be wrong, it should be set right, and if the decision of the Chair be correct, the House should so affirm.

The gentleman from Ohio quoted in his speech two decisions upon this point—one by Ex-Speaker Cobb and one by Ex-Speaker Winthrop—which sustain his view by declaring that no point can be raised upon a matter referred to the committee; that, as the rules give such unlimited scope, it is not for the Chair to prescribe a limit. The Chair is quite aware that in the position he takes he differs with both those eminent predecessors.

Mr. BEATTY. Will the Chair permit me——

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs not to be interrupted. It is by no means uncommon that the occupant of the chair is called on by the varying developments of the business of the House to make a different ruling from that which has been made at some period long anterior. The Chair has taken that responsibility heretofore on more than one occasion. Such cases present merely a difference of judgment, to be determined ultimately by the House, whose will and ruling must, of course, govern the Chair.

But when the gentleman from Ohio undertakes to state, as he has, that the present occupant of the chair has made a ruling entirely different from the present, the Chair must answer him. As an instance in which, as the gentleman contends, the Chair maintained a position inconsistent with that which he is now urging, the gentleman presented in his speech extracts from the Globe which will be read by the Clerk. The first is from page 3118 of the Globe of the second session of the Forty-first Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Tributes to Abraham Lincoln.

"Mr. Laflin, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with an amendment, a joint resolution (S. R. No. 77) authorizing the distribution of the copies remaining in the Department of State of the Tributes of the Nations to Abraham Lincoln.

"Mr. SCHOFELD. Is that a privileged report? It does not relate to printing, but to the distribution of donations to members. Is the committee authorized to report at any time anything except bills and resolutions for printing?

"The SPEAKER. This resolution was referred to the committee, and the rule states that the Committee on Printing is authorized to report at any time. It is for the House to say what they will do with the report, but the Chair is unable under the rules to prescribe what they shall report."

The SPEAKER. The other extract, which the Clerk will now read, has reference to the late action of the House upon matters connected with the Congressional Globe, and will be found on page 1330 of the Congressional Globe for the present session.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. BEATTY. I ask that Wednesday of next week be assigned for the consideration of this bill.

"Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio. Will my colleague [Mr. Beatty] indicate some limit of time? Can he not limit the consideration of this bill to the day he has named?

"The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest, as this bill is now in the hands of a committee authorized to report at any time, it had better be held in possession of the committee until an opportune moment occurs, because they would lose rather than gain control of it by having it assigned in the House to any particular day."

The SPEAKER. As to these two cases the Chair will say that were they before the House now, he would rule precisely as he did then.

The first case related to the distribution of public documents which had been printed by the Public Printer. Distribution is so intimately connected with public printing that it is generally embodied in the resolution authorizing the printing. It is generally provided that so many copies of the document in question shall be for this or that Department, so many for the Senate, so many for the House, &c. That was entirely in accordance with the decision which the Chair is now making, and will be so ruled again.

In regard to the second instance, which is in relation to the bill for printing the congressional debates in the columns of the Globe, of course it is so palpable and so plain that that fell within the scope of the Chair's decision, he has only to call attention to it to reaffirm his decision. A bill in relation to printing the debates in the columns of the Globe would of course come strictly and directly within the ruling of the Chair, because it relates to the every-day convenience of the House, on which, if on anything at all, the Committee on Printing would be allowed to report to the House at any time.

Both of these decisions of the Chair are such as he would reaffirm as coming within the scope of the reasoning he has endeavored thus hurriedly to submit to the House. He desires in some form, as he has conversed with his associates on the Committee on Rules and with an eminent predecessor in the position he now occupies [Mr. Banks] in regard to it, some action of the House on the point. He is so entirely clear himself, that in his own mind there is no doubt; but he submits to the superior judgment of the House, which must prevail as to the ultimate construction.

Mr. BEATTY. May I be allowed to say a word?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no objection.

Mr. DAWES. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. BEATTY. Not more than ten minutes. I do not propose to occupy much time. Now, if I understand the Chair correctly in the construction of this rule to which reference has been made, we are to be governed by the opinion of the gentleman who introduced the rule, and not by the rule itself. It seems to me when a simple rule is agreed upon for the government of any committee in this House——

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is so much confusion in the House that we cannot hear what is being said by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the House will give the same attention to the gentleman from Ohio which it so kindly gave to himself.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is so much disorder that we cannot hear what is being said, and it is too important a question to be decided without our knowing all about it.

The SPEAKER called the House to order, and requested members to resume their seats.

Mr. BEATTY. What I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, is this: that the rule itself should govern and not the opinion of the gentleman who introduced the rule. Now, in the discharge of my duties as a member of this House, I found the rules gave the committee to which I belong the right to report at any time. The rule was couched in plain and unmistakable English. It was not susceptible of two constructions. The words were short, simple, and easily understood. I flattered myself, therefore, that I knew what they meant, and perhaps I congratulated myself that, dull as I was, there was one thing I did know. My committee authorized me to report a bill, one which contemplates the ultimate reduction of the expenses of the Government to the extent of $500,000 a year; and the merits of that bill I am ready to discuss with the Speaker or any one else whenever it is introduced. I determined for once to insist on the privileges accorded to my committee, and succeeded in getting the eye of the Speaker. Some member objected, and I found that leave to report at any time meant that the Printing Committee is privileged to report resolutions to waste the public money, but not to report resolutions to save the public money, and that the rule which says the Printing Committee shall have leave to report at any time means they shall not be permitted to report an honest resolution at all.

The upshot of the whole matter is that the rules of the House afford no protection, no facilities to one who desires to proceed in a quiet, business-like way to the transaction of the public business, and put no restraints whatever on those who do not. If a plain, simple rule like that under which the Printing Committee acts can be construed to mean just the reverse of what it says, language is a cheat and parliamentary law a myth. The idea that a man must search through two hundred and forty thousand columns of the Congressional Globe to ascertain the meaning of one short sentence composed of fifteen simple English words is too ridiculously absurd for even a believer in Baron Munchausen.

If a knowledge of parliamentary law now requires such Herculean labor as this, you would save time, money, and bitterest agony of soul by making a bonfire of your parliamentary history and starting afresh, with rules so plain that they could not be misunderstood, and then applying them so rigidly that no distracting and conflicting precedents could rise up to say that in such and such cases white is white, but that in all other cases white is invariably black.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to say a few words on this question. I quite understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Beatty] might naturally mistake the powers of the Committee on Printing on reading the rule to which he refers. But he will see, if he will look at the spirit of the rule, that it does limit him in the degree which the Chair has stated. The rule is that the Committee on the Printing of the House shall have leave to report at any time. The words "the House" are not inserted in the rule; but that is the spirit of the rule. The Committee on the Printing of the House shall have authority to report at any time. The reason of that is that it concerns the privileges of the House. If we are called upon to act upon an important recommendation by the President of the United States, he sends a message. We cannot act upon that until the message is printed, as well as the documents that may accompany the message. It is for that reason that the rule gives this power to the committee.

Mr. BEATTY. Let me ask the gentleman if the rules say so?

Mr. BANKS. I have no doubt the rule would have said so if it had not been thought that everybody understood it. It is necessary in order to understand the recommendations of the message that we should have the message and document printed. Now, the law says that these matters shall be referred to the Committee on Printing. If we want an extra number of copies printed, that is not within the discretion of the House until it has been so referred. And the law says that inasmuch as this refers to the privilege of the House, the Committee on Printing shall have authority to report to the House at any time. That is the spirit of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly sure that no predecessor of yours in the House has ever made a ruling different from that. In the cases that have been referred to there may have been something in the nature of the bill that would make it a question whether the committee had a right to report or not, as in the case of the proceedings of the different governments in regard to the assassination of President Lincoln. That matter having been referred to the Committee on Printing, and the assassination having occupied the attention of the Government, and having been made a subject of consideration in the House, the papers relating to that subject might very naturally be considered as affecting the privileges of the House, and it was proper that the Committee on Printing should report at any time on that matter, although, of course, gentlemen on the floor and the Chair might differ as to that.

The same may be said of the cases to which the Chair has referred, on which decisions were given by Speaker Cobb and Speaker Winthrop. I do not know what those cases were. They might have been of such a nature as to give the committee the right to report at any time, and they might not have been of such a nature. But it was very proper for the Chair in this case to say that the rule was so broad, and the case submitted so uncertain that the House should decide whether the committee had the right or not. But on a question of general legislation being referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, or to the Committee on Printing, or to the Committee of Elections, or to the Committee on Appropriations, or to the Committee of Ways and Means, which all have the right to report at any time, it would not be ruled by any Speaker that that gave them the right to report at any time on a matter of general legislation. The right of these committees to report at any time is only in regard to that which concerns the privileges of the House or touches its constitution, and it is necessary in order that the House shall accord those privileges that this power shall be accorded to those committees.

Thus the Committee of Elections have the authority to report at any time.

Mr. BEATTY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. They have not that right.

Mr. BANKS. They have the right to report at any time, but only on the right of a member to his seat. The Committee on Rules have the right to report at any time, but only on the rules or the order of business of the House. The Committee on Printing have the right to report at any time, but only in regard to the printing of the House. The Committee on Enrolled Bills has the right to report at any time, but only on enrolled bills, bills that have been enacted. The Committee on Appropriations has the right to report at any time, but only upon those matters of appropriation established and fixed by law; if by their report they propose to change one of those items of appropriation to the extent of one dollar, of one dime, it is out of order by the rule of the House. The Committee of Ways and Means formerly had the same right on the subject of appropriations. Now, if those committees were compelled to await their turns for six or seven months, as the Committee on Foreign Affairs and other committees have to wait, before they could report upon the matters before them touching the convenience and business of the House, none of those matters could be acted upon by the House in time, perhaps, to accomplish what might be desired by the House.

I can understand very well that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Beatty] might mistake, in perfect good faith, the meaning of the rule. But I think that upon a further consideration of the subject he will perceive that the spirit of the rule, if not its language, is in accordance with the decision of the Chair. As this matter touches so many committees, and is one of so much importance, I ask leave of the House to submit a resolution upon this subject.

Mr. BEATTY. Will the gentleman allow me to have read in this connection the rulings of Speaker Winthrop, Speaker Cobb, and Speaker BLAINE?

Mr. BANKS. I have not examined the decision of Speaker Winthrop, but at the time he was acting as Speaker of the House bills were not introduced as they are now. Petitions were then introduced in open session, as is now done in the Senate, and were referred to committees, and the action of committees was generally based on petitions so introduced and referred. Formerly there would be thirty or forty bills introduced during a session, while now from three to four thousand bills are introduced in a single Congress. Formerly a motion for leave to introduce a bill would be debated for three or four weeks. Now, it is impossible for members to understand what bills go to a committee. The difference that now exists in the mode of proceeding in the House should be taken into consideration when reference is made to the decision of Hon. Mr. Winthrop. I submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That the ruling of the Chair in the case now stated, upon the authority of the Committee on Printing to report at any time, be, and hereby is, sustained by the House."

Mr. STEVENSON. Is that resolution in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. STEVENSON. Without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is. The gentleman might have objected at the first to the Chair proceeding with this matter. But the Chair having introduced the question by consent of the House has a right to the judgment of the House upon it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] whether it would not be better to have this resolution referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would greatly prefer an adverse decision of the House to a reference of this resolution to the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules can report at any time, and the decision of the House will enable them intelligently to do so. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] will not accept the suggestion to have this resolution referred to the Committee on Rules, because to do so would not be a matter of justice either to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Beatty,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing, or to the Chair.

Mr. BEATTY. I would like to have the rules changed; I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The question now is not whether the rules should be changed, but whether the construction by the Chair of the existing rule is correct.

Mr. BEATTY. I ask that the following decisions of Speaker Winthrop and Speaker Cobb be read before the House votes on this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that some extracts from his speech on Saturday last be read.

Mr. BEATTY. And which are also extracts from the Globe.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The SPEAKER stated the question. The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to claim for the Speaker the discretionary power to say what character of reports the Committee on Printing might make under their general leave to report at any time. The Chair overruled the point of order, and disclaimed any such power. The rule was express that the Committee on Printing might report at any time, without reference to the nature or character of the report."—Speaker Winthrop.

"The SPEAKER. * * * The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Burt] submits, as a point of order, that under the rules of the House the gentleman from Mississippi is not entitled to make this report as a privileged question. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the ground that the twenty-first rule of the House provides that it shall be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time. The rule places no restriction whatever upon the subject-matter to be reported; and in the opinion of the Chair it is limited only to the fact whether or not the subject be legitimately before that committee."—Speaker Cobb.

Mr. BEATTY. I ask to have read in the same connection a ruling of the present occupant of the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The SPEAKER. This resolution was referred to the committee, and the rule states that the Committee on Printing is authorized to report at any time. It is for the House to say what they will do with the report, but the Chair is unable under the rules to prescribe what they shall report."

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I am not aware whether the House referred this bill to the Committee on Printing. If it was so referred, that might possibly give the committee a broader jurisdiction than it would otherwise have; but if the committee originated it——

Mr. BEATTY. Allow me to state that the bill was a substitute for two resolutions which were referred in open House to the committee.

Mr. DAWES. A reference to the rule creating the Committee on Printing will show the extent of its jurisdiction. I do not doubt that the House can give the committee a new or extended jurisdiction; but in the absence of that, it must be perfectly apparent that the right to report at any time can only be coextensive with the jurisdiction of the committee; and a reference to the rule creating the committee shows the limited character of its authority, in the absence of any new or additional authority given by the House. As has been stated by the Chair, the jurisdiction of the committee relates solely to the matter of printing.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, that I have for fourteen years been a member of a privileged committee, a committee having, in the language of the rules, a right to report at any time. I was for ten years upon the Committee of Elections, which has been considered as having the highest privilege; and it has always been the practice of that committee and the ruling of the Speaker that whenever that committee desired to present any legislation in the form of a bill it should be reported under the general call; that as to such matters the committee had no right to report at any time. I remember that on one occasion I sought to submit a bill from the committee in reference to the election of members of Congress, and there was a distinct ruling of the Chair that such a measure did not come within the privilege of the committee to report at any time. When I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations, that committee having the same right to report at any time, I was always obliged to obtain leave to report any bill in reference to general subjects. So with the Committee of Ways and Means. This morning I reported from that committee two bills, one properly coming within the jurisdiction which the rules give my committee, and I reported it without leave, because I had a right to do so at any time; but as to the other bill, which was of a different character, I asked unanimous consent of the House to report it. The right of the Committee of Elections, the Committee on Appropriations, and the Committee of Ways and Means to report at any time has always, while I have been a member of the House, been construed as limited to the special matters over which those committees by their creation have jurisdiction.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the gentleman is mistaken in alleging that any rule authorizes the Committee of Elections to report at any time. Their privilege in that respect results only from the privileged nature of the matters generally committed to them.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it would be wise to send a resolution of this kind to the Committee on the Rules. That committee is composed of five members, the Speaker being one, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Banks] another, both of whom have stated their view as to the question before the House. As another member of that committee, I beg to concur in what they have said, and I do so for one simple reason. The rules of this House were made for the purpose of protecting minorities by obstructing and impeding legislation. They were framed at an early day in the history of our Government, when men had "strict-construction" ideas, both as to the constitution of the House and the Constitution of the country. They were not framed like the rules of most legislative bodies for facilitating legislation. I hold that the House would be departing from the original reason and philosophy of our rules if it did not sustain the Speaker in the construction which he has given to the rule now in question—a decision supported by the very reasons out of which the rule grew. We have here legislation of all sorts; it is multifarious in its character. It is worse tenfold than when I came to Congress in 1856. There is greater reason growing out of the business which comes in this multifarious way to Congress, and in the aggrandizement of power by the Government as the result of the war—there is greater reason, I say, why the Speaker, when he gives a strict construction to the rules, should be sustained by the House. I hope this will not be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DAWES. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution submitted by Mr. Banks.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 157, noes 6.

So the resolution was adopted; and the decision of the Chair sustained as the judgment of the House.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Ever since the rendering of that decision, which was agreed to by the House with only six dissenting votes, the limitation has been exercised against the Committee on Printing whenever the question has been raised. The Committee of Elections have the right to report at any time in reference to the right of a member to his seat, but never has it been conceded that that committee had the right to report at any time general legislation relating to the election of members of Congress. The Committee on Enrolled Bills have the right to report at any time as to enrolled bills, and no further. And so it is with the Committee on Printing. They have the right to report at any time resolutions for printing documents and papers required by the House, or by both Houses. Their right to report at any time, however, does not extend to bills changing the statutes of the United States. If it did then that committee would have an advantage over every other committee of the House, except the Committee of Ways and Means, the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, which committees, under the rule recently adopted, have had that right specially conferred upon them. But nowhere has the right ever been conceded to the Committee on Printing to report at any time, except on subjects relating to the printing of documents for the use of the House or for the use of Congress, when contested, since said decision of the point of order, sustained as it was by actual vote of the House.

The Chair therefore sustains the point of order that this bill does not have that privilege attached to it which would bring it from the Committee on Printing at any time to the interruption of other business. The gentleman from Mississippi has his remedy, however, for he can, when his committee is regularly called in the morning hour, report this bill as any other committee could when regularly called report on any other matter of general legislation.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will it be in order for me to move that the substitute be printed and recommitted?

The SPEAKER. It will be if there be no objection.

Mr. CONGER. Opposed to the bill as I am I must persist in my objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the bill being printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider?

Mr. CONGER. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the substitute is ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider. The gentleman from Mississippi on the regular call of the Committee on Printing will have the right to report this bill back just as he would have the right to report any other bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. This disposition having been made of the report I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling, printed in the Congressional Globe, part 2, second session Thirty-ninth Congress, page 973, upon this subject, in order that if the question should come up again the ruling of the Speaker as now made may perhaps be in some way changed, the ruling I refer to having been made upon a bill nearly in terms the same as this, and it was held to be in order to be reported at any time.

The SPEAKER. That decision was very fully reviewed by the then occupant of the chair, Mr. BLAINE, when he made the decision heretofore quoted. But the Chair does not rest upon the decision of the then Speaker. That decision was confirmed by a vote of the House with only six dissentients. That is what estops the Chair from giving any other decision. But if this House thinks otherwise it has its remedy, and the Chair invites a review of the decision in the usual form.

Mr. SPRINGER. That can come up if the question is raised again after a further examination.

Mr. CONGER. It is competent for the gentleman to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question can be raised again by an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The Chair has no feeling on the subject and would have been glad to have submitted the question to the House except for the decision alluded to, which was confirmed by a vote of a former House and accepted ever since as binding.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to examine the question further because I am not familiar with the point of order at this time, and it can be raised hereafter.

STATE OF LABOR IN EUROPE.

Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 84) appropriating $4,000 for printing 15,000 copies of the letter of the Secretary of State, with consular reports, &c., on the state of labor in Europe; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. PHELPS, by unanimous cansent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2171) donating condemned cannon and cannon-balls to the Soldiers' Monument Association of Birmingham, Connecticut; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to report from the Committee on Appropriations the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the bill be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations, with leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations have the right to report at any time for reference. The Chair presumes this bill would go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BAKER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the bill is recommitted points of order can be reserved when it comes back to the House. A note, however, will be made that the gentleman reserves points of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to offer an amendment by way of instruction to the committee, and will explain it very briefly.

The Clerk read Mr. HAWLEY'S proposed amendment, as follows:

Amend by adding:

And the Committee on Appropriations is instructed to report the bill substantially in the form and containing the matter of the legislative, executive, and judicial bill as last agreed to by the House, excluding therefrom all general political legislation and all appropriations for judicial expenses.

Mr. ATKINS. Is that in the form of an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it in order?

The SPEAKER. It is, as the gentleman from Tennessee did not demand the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. HAWLEY. Am I entitled to the floor?

Mr. ATKINS. Is it in order to move to lay that amendment on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, unless the gentleman wants the bill to go to the table with it. The Chair will read the following from the Digest:

A motion to commit may be amended by the addition of instructions.

Mr. ATKINS. How did the gentleman from Connecticut get the floor?

The SPEAKER. Because the gentleman from Tennessee did not demand the previous question on the motion to recommit; and when the gentleman from Connecticut rose the Chair had nothing else to do but to recognize him.

Mr. HAWLEY. I addressed the Chair promptly on the gentleman making his motion. I do not propose to antagonize the gentleman from Tennessee, for whom I have the highest respect. I only wish to explain what I think is a good reason for making the proposition I have submitted.

Mr. HOUSE. Is this by unanimous consent?

Mr. ATKINS. I have never been off the floor. I do not know how the gentleman from Connecticut got the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He made his motion and stopped talking.

Mr. ATKINS. Gentlemen frequently make pauses.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I took the floor and commenced talking.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee did not in any statement he made demand the previous question nor indicate by words any such purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. My understanding is that the gentleman from Tennessee asked unanimous consent to report the bill with leave to have it printed and recommitted. What was the gentleman's request?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the record to be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] having asked leave to report the bill for the purpose of having it recommitted and printed, I object to its consideration at this time as being contrary to the request made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS.]

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] states that he never yielded the floor, the Chair will take his word for it, of course.

Mr. ATKINS. I did not yield the floor, but was in momentary expectation that the Chair would put the question on my motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. Precisely; I beg to be heard upon that.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask if it is in order for me to withdraw the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ATKINS. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; but I would not have hurt the gentleman's bill.

Mr. ATKINS. You did not hurt the bill at all.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] having acted under the instructions of the committee who made the report, he cannot withdraw it without the instructions of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing of the action of the committee; that is not within the province of the Chair; it is a question for the chairman of the committee to determine for himself.

Mr. MORRISON. You will have the bill before you again; you need not be alarmed about that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Neither will you escape my motion.

Mr. MORRISON. We will see if we do not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was presented to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the international exhibitions to be held at Sydney and Melbourne, Australia, in 1879 and 1880.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 62) for the delivery to Samuel Lord, jr., receiver, of certain bonds now in the Treasury of the United States.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES TO UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at fifteen minutes past one o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour, which is the report from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of the bill (H. R. No. 1715) to repeal certain sections of the Revised Statutes and to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes and of the Statutes at Large relating to the removal of causes from State courts. The pending motion is to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS. It was the understanding of the committee that one hour for discussion should be allowed on this side of the House upon this bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That was the agreement.

Mr. THOMAS. As a member of the minority of the committee who has not spoken, I desire to take the floor, and will first yield thirty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. THOMAS next addressed the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. MCMILLIN. Before the morning hour expires——

Mr. THOMAS. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER.) Eight minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I desire to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not desire the floor for that brief period.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I will yield it to any other gentleman who may desire it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to the act of 1815, which gave the jurisdiction spoken of by him. In that act I find this proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any prosecution for an offense involving corporal punishment.

Mr. WHITE. Are we running on that eight minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour is running.

Mr. WHITE. My friend from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] had eight minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHITE. I do not want it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I simply desire to call the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania to the fact that the law of 1815 did not involve the transfer of any cause where corporal punishment was inflicted, and hence it was not the foundation of this vicious legislation. In the second place, it was limited to one year only.

Mr. WHITE. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] went out of the Hall in search of the proviso which he has read, before I made my explanation. The direct question which the gentleman addressed to me was whether criminal prosecutions were not excluded from the operation of the act of 1815. I said that they were not, and I say so yet. I then read the proviso which he has just read, and which, it will be observed, withdraws from the purview of the act only those criminal prosecutions which involve corporal punishment. Now there are in this country, and there were in 1815, criminal prosecutions which did not necessarily involve corporal punishment upon conviction, but the punishment was by the imposition of fines; such as are called qui tam actions, which are quasi-prosecutions, &c. The cases do not recur to me at this moment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Are they all criminal prosecutions?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly they are. The proviso says that the act shall not apply to criminal prosecutions where corporal punishments are involved, of course contemplating the application of the act to a certain class of criminal prosecutions, and not to a certain other class. The subsequent legislation of 1816 and 1817 extended the operations of the act to 1822. And the law of 1833 that Webster championed did not have that proviso attached to it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The point made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] as I understood him, was that the act of 1815 was the foundation for the transfer of criminal causes from State courts to the district courts of the United States. I hold that it was not, and for that purpose I have read the proviso.

Mr. WHITE. One moment before my friend sits down. A friend near me has handed me Bouvier's law dictionary. Under the word "corporal" I find the definition "an epithet for anything belonging to the body; as corporal punishment, punishment inflicted upon the person of the criminal."

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is a correct definition of corporal punishment.

Mr. WHITE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has not quite; there are three minutes remaining.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask, then, that the morning hour may be considered as expired.

The SPEAKER, (having resumed the chair.) By unanimous consent the morning hour will be considered as expired.

There was no objection.

GENERAL FITZ JOHN PORTER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the proceedings and report of the board of officers convened by Special Order No. 78, Headquarters of the Army, Washington, April 12, 1878, in the case of Fitz John Porter. The report of the board was made in March last, but the official record of the proceedings did not reach me until the 3d instant.

I have given to this report such examination as satisfies me that I ought to lay the proceedings and conclusions of the board before Congress. As I am without power in the absence of legislation to act upon the recommendations of the report further than by submitting the same to Congress, the proceedings and conclusions of the board are transmitted for the information of Congress and such action as in your wisdom shall seem expedient and just.

R. B. HAYES.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, June 5, 1879.

The SPEAKER. This message and the accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is printed? The message and all the accompanying papers? Probably all ought to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to have all the papers printed? Perhaps authority had better be given to the committee to have printed what they desire.

Mr. GARFIELD. Perhaps it would be well to have the message printed, and to refer the documents with the message to the committee, and if they want any of them printed they can do it hereafter.

The SPEAKER. Not unless the House grants that right. The Chair will submit the motion to the House to refer the message and accompanying documents to the Committee on Military Affairs, with the understanding that the committee may have printed such of the documents as they may desire. It is usual to pay the respect to messages from the President of ordering them to be printed. There is really, however, no use in printing this particular message unless the accompanying documents are also printed.

Mr. KEIFER. Is it in order to move that the message and accompanying documents be printed?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. KEIFER. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPARKS. That covers all.

The SPEAKER. It covers everything.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SPEER on account of the serious illness of his wife.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2172) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] to allow me to say a word.

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly; I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have seen what I have understood to be the draught of this bill; and without any other knowledge than that obtained from a cursory glance, I would say that it seems to me a bill to which there is no objection so far as its contents are concerned. But I do want to suggest to the gentleman——

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot yield to the gentleman for a speech. I thought he wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, then, I will ask the gentleman whether he does not think that for the convenient administration of this appropriation bill after it is passed it would be better to state substantively in the bill exactly what appropriations are made?

Mr. ATKINS. A school-boy ten years old who could not understand this bill in a day ought not to be sent to school another hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I suppose that a school-boy could certainly mark out——

Mr. ATKINS. Of course I do not mean any disrespect to the gentleman; he understands that perfectly. I simply mean to say that any officer with any executive ability can understand this bill in one day.

Mr. GARFIELD. But it must be codified before anybody can administer it.

Mr. ATKINS. Well, it can be codified in one day.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. All points of order are reserved by the gentleman from Michigan.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. ATKINS that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would like to bring before the House a matter that can be disposed of in a few minutes. In the early part of the session a bill was reported providing for the publication of the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is believed that if the Government publishes these reports at cost with 10 per cent. added, they can be furnished to the profession at $1.50 a volume against $5, the present price. That bill is now in Committee of the Whole. I desire to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering it.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the motion.

CATTLE DISEASES.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to call up for consideration the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 1378) to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals. This bill, which was reported from the Committee on Agriculture some days ago, was made a special order for May 29 after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The special order now coming up is the bill to which the gentleman from Missouri asks attention. It was made a special order for a day now passed; but as it was a continuing order, to remain in force from day to day until the bill should be disposed of, it now comes up in order. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road from one State or Territory to another, or from a State into the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat, shall receive for transportation, or transport, from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live cattle affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia. Nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live cattle, knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease; nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private conveyance from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live cattle, knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia.

SEC. 2. Any company or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of, or person having control over, such live cattle, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 1 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of section 1 of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint, and the same shall be heard before any circuit court of the United States or any district court of the United States holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed, or the person or corporation resides or carries on, or has his or its place of business.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of preventing violations of this act it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to select suitable localities on all lines of railroad, river, or canal interstate communication that he may have information the disease exists, and to appoint competent, practical experts, who shall be known and designated as inspectors of live cattle, to inspect all live cattle received at such localities for shipment, or passing through the same in transitu from one State or Territory to another or from any State into the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That said inspector of live cattle shall be residents of the localities where they may be assigned to duty, and that the number to be appointed under the provisions of this act shall not exceed three in any State where the disease is known to exist: And provided further, That the said Commissioner shall have power to appoint not exceeding three skilled medical and veterinary practitioners for special duty, as he may from time to time deem necessary to aid in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall prescribe the duties of said inspectors, and shall make all needful rules and regulations to govern such inspections, to the end that the transportation from one State or Territory to another of live cattle affected with contagious or infectious diseases may be prevented under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That the inspectors appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture under the provisions of this act shall be paid a salary not exceeding a sum at the rate of $4 per diem, and that said medical and veterinary practitioners shall be paid for their services a sum not exceeding $10 per diem during the time they may be so employed: Provided, That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 7. That to prevent the exportation from any port of the United States to any port in a foreign country of live cattle affected with any infectious or contagious disease, and especially pleuro-pneumonia, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to take such steps and adopt such measures not inconsistent with the provisions of this act as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint one or more skilled persons as inspectors at the port of New York, and any other port in the United States from which he may have information that live cattle are being shipped, whose duty it shall be to examine carefully all live cattle offered for shipment at such port. And if upon such examination it shall be found that any cattle so about to be exported are affected with any infectious or contagious disease, that fact shall be reported without delay to the collector of the port, whose duty it shall be, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to refuse a clearance to any vessel which shall take on board such cattle for exportation. And the collector shall, upon report of such inspection, notify the nearest State and local sanitary authorities of the existence of any such infectious or contagious disease among cattle at such port. The exporter of such cattle as shall be found free of any such infectious or contagious disease, and not in any infected herd, shall be entitled to a certificate from the collector to that effect.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority to prescribe all needful rules and regulations for carrying into effect sections 7 and 8 of this act; and all expenses attending the execution of the same shall be paid out of the appropriations for collecting the revenues from customs.

SEC. 10. That whenever any infectious or contagious disease affecting domestic animals, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, shall be brought into or shall break out in the District of Columbia, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of said District to take measures to suppress the same promptly and to prevent the same from spreading; and for this purpose the said commissioners are hereby empowered to order and require that any premises, farm, or farms, where such disease exists, or has existed, to be put in quarantine, to order all or any animals coming into the District to be detained at any place or places for the purpose of inspection and examination, to prescribe regulations for, and to require the destruction of, animals affected with infectious or contagious disease and for the proper disposition of their hides and carcases to prescribe regulations for disinfection and such other regulations as they may deem necessary to prevent infection or contagion being communicated.

SEC. 11. That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to supersede or impair any sanitary or quarantine law of any State.

SEC. 12. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the interposition of public forces under sanction and by forms of law for the better protection of that great and growing branch of our agricultural industry, the raising and handling of neat cattle, has long been apparent to the people of the section which I have the honor in part to represent. From time to time efforts have been made by the various Western States, notably Missouri, to protect their own citizens by local statutes designed to so regulate the transportation of cattle in the processes of commerce as to guard against the introduction and spread of infectious or contagious diseases. It is not worth while at this time to go into a detailed history of these efforts, nor is it in keeping with my purpose to enter into a technical pathological thesis upon the diseases themselves which have been sought to be guarded against. Suffice to say on this point that the necessity for these attempted regulations is of comparatively recent origin, and is in my judgment mainly due to the revolution which the increase of railroad facilities has wrought in the system of interstate commerce.

Under the old regimé, when cattle were made to transport themselves "on the hoof," as the drovers say, the very conditions of the traffic itself imposed, in common, it may be said, with the primitive or natural processes of commerce generally, sufficient sanitary restrictions. Under those conditions the health of herds was in a great measure guaranteed by the natural and normal exercise of being driven, and the changes of food and of climate were brought about so gradually that the cattle traffic was not subject to the vicissitudes which modern experience has from time to time developed so fatally to the true interests of all concerned.

It is a maxim that the refinements of civilization impose their pains and penalties as well as their blessings and profits; and the great change which the railroad as a refinement of civilization has wrought in the cattle trade is no exception. The completion of the great lines of railway between the grazing plains of the southwest and the markets of the northeast has indeed conferred a blessing alike upon the breeder of cattle and the consumer of beef, in that it has shortened the labor of months into that of days and crowded the profits of a life time into a single year on the one hand, while it has cheapened the product to the consumer and universalized the supply at all seasons and under all circumstances on the other. But it has also imposed a penalty, in that it involves certain violations of, or, at least, challenges to, the laws of nature, the effects of which can be counteracted only by the application of art in the handling, skill in managing, and science in treating the subject-matter.

It must be obvious to any reflecting mind that between a herd of cattle driven gradually and by easy stages from one climate to another and a herd whirled through the same space at a rate of twenty miles an hour there must necessarily be great difference of sanitary conditions on arriving at a given point. This proposition indeed seems to me to be too plain to require any demonstration other than the bare statement of it; and even were the proposition not sufficiently logical in itself, considered abstractly, I would need only to point to the cumulative experience of those who have conducted the cattle traffic of the West and Southwest during the last decade to verify it beyond cavil. I therefore assume the proposition as a premise and proceed to state that upon it have been based all the local efforts at regulation by law to which I referred at the outset.

But these local attempts at regulation by law have failed to produce the result sought, to wit: "the prevention and spread of infectious and contagious diseases among domestic animals," which is a part of the object avowed in the title of the bill that I have the honor to present for the consideration of the House. This failure has been due not to any lack of intelligence or want of experience on the part of the local authorities, but simply to their want of proper power under the Constitution of the United States to enforce their enactments. Under this head the experience of the State of Missouri forms a sufficient illustration. The Legislature of Missouri passed an act to regulate the importation of cattle from other States and Territories into her boundaries during certain months of the year, the design being to prevent the introduction and spread of a dangerous infectious and contagious disease.

This act was wisely conceived and ably framed. It was also executed with ability and propriety at the outset, and the effects of its operation were speedily felt to the benefit and protection of the cattle-breeders of Missouri. I have no doubt that had no higher power intervened to estop the operation of this statute, it would have been found ample for the protection of the interests of the citizens of the State against the introduction and spread of the disease provided against. But a higher power did intervene. An interested party, to wit, the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company, finding its interests as a common carrier impaired through the restrictions and regulations imposed by the statute in question, disregarded it, by legal advice, on the ground that it was in conflict with that part of section 8, article 1 of the Constitution of the United States which provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States and with the Indian tribes."

Suit was brought against the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company by Mr. Husen, a citizen of Missouri, under the protectory statute in question, and the courts of the State decided in his favor. The railroad company thereupon appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that learned body reversed the decision of the State courts in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Strong and published in the reports, (5 Otto, 465 to 474 inclusive.)

In this opinion the learned justice, speaking as the court, holds the following language:

The Missouri statute is a plain interference with such transportation, an attempted exercise over it of the highest possible power—that of destruction. It meets at the borders of the State a large and common subject of commerce, and prohibits its crossing the State line during two-thirds of each year, with a proviso, however, that such cattle may come across the line loaded upon a railroad car or steamboat, and pass through the State without being unloaded. But even the right of steamboat owners and railroad companies to transport such property through the State is loaded by the law with onerous liabilities because of their agency in the transportation. The object and effect of the statute are, therefore, to obstruct interstate commerce, and to discriminate between the property of citizens of one State and that of citizens of other States. This court has heretofore said that interstate transportation of passengers is beyond the reach of a State Legislature. And if, as we have held, State taxation of persons passing from one State to another, or a State tax upon interstate transportation of passengers, is prohibited by the Constitution because a burden upon it, a fortiori, if possible, is a State tax upon the carriage of merchandise from State to State. Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself; and every obstacle to it or burden laid upon it by legislative authority is regulation. (Case of the State freight tax, 15 Wall. 232; Ward vs. Maryland, 12 id., 418; Welton vs. The State of Missouri, 91 United States, 275; Henderson et al vs. Mayor of the city of New York et al., 92 id., 259; Chy Lung vs. Freeman et al., id., 275.) The two latter of these cases refer to obstructions against the admission of persons into a State; but the principles asserted are equally applicable to all subjects of commerce.

We are thus brought to the question whether the Missouri statute is a lawful exercise of the police power of the State. We admit that the deposit in Congress of the power to regulate foreign commerce and commerce among the States was not a surrender of that which may properly be denominated police power. What that power is it is difficult to define with sharp precision. It is generally said to extend to making regulations promotive of domestic order, morals, health, and safety. As was said in Thorp vs. The Rutland and Burlington Railroad Company, 27 Vermont, 149, "it extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property within the State. According to the maxim sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, which, being of universal application, it must, of course, be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which every one may so use his own as not injure others." It was further said that by the general police power of a State "persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State; of the perfect right of the Legislature to do which no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made so far as natural persons are concerned." It may also be admitted that the police power of a State justifies the adoption of precautionary measures against social evils. Under it a State may legislate to prevent the spread of crime, or pauperism, or disturbance of the peace. It may exclude from its limits convicts, paupers, idiots, and lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, as well as persons afflicted by contagious or infectious diseases; a right founded, as intimated in the passenger cases, 7 Howard, 283, by Mr. Justice Grier, in the sacred law of self-defense. (Vide 3 Sawyer, 283.) The same principle, it may also be conceded, would justify the exclusion of property dangerous to the property of citizens of the State; for example, animals having contagious or infectious diseases. All these exertions of power are in immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against noxious acts of other persons or such a use of property as is injurious to the property of others. They are self-defensive.

But whatever may be the nature and reach of the police power of a State, it cannot be exercised over a subject confided exclusively to Congress by the Federal Constitution. It cannot invade the domain of the National Government. It was said in Henderson et al. vs. Mayor of the City of New York et al., supra, to "be clear, from the nature of our complex form of government, that whenever the statute of a State invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied it may be to powers conceded to belong to the States." Substantially the same thing was said by Chief-Justice Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1. Neither the unlimited powers of a State to tax nor any of its large police powers can be exercised to such an extent as to work a practical assumption of the powers properly conferred upon Congress by the Constitution.

Many acts of a State may indeed affect commerce without amounting to a regulation of it in the constitutional sense of the term. And it is sometimes difficult to define the distinction between that which merely affects or influences and that which regulates or furnishes a rule for conduct. There is no such difficulty in the present case. While we unhesitatingly admit that a State may pass sanitary laws and laws for the protection of life, liberty, health, or property within its borders; while it may prevent persons and animals suffering under contagious or infectious diseases or convicts, &c., from entering the State; while, for the purpose of self-protection it may establish quarantine and reasonable inspection laws, it may not interfere with transportation into or through the State beyond what is absolutely necessary for its self-protection. It may not, under the cover of exerting its police powers, substantially prohibit or burden either foreign or interstate commerce. Upon this subject the cases in 92 U. S., to which we have referred, are very instructive. In Henderson vs. The Mayor, &c., the statute of New York was defended as a police regulation to protect the State against the influx of foreign paupers; but it was held to be unconstitutional, because its practical result was to impose a burden upon all passengers from foreign countries. And it was laid down that "in whatever language a statute may be framed, its purpose must be determined by its natural and reasonable effect." The reach of the statute was far beyond its professed object, and far into the realm which is within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress. So in the case of Chy Lung vs. Freeman, where the pretense was the exclusion of lewd women; but as the statute was more far-reaching and affected other immigrants not of any class which the State could lawfully exclude, we held it unconstitutional. Neither of these cases denied the right of a State to protect herself against paupers, convicted criminals, or lewd women, by necessary and proper laws, in the absence of legislation by Congress; but it was ruled that the right could only arise from vital necessity, and that it could not be carried beyond the scope of that necessity. These cases, it is true, speak only of laws affecting the entrance of persons into a State; but the constitutional doctrines they maintain are equally applicable to interstate transportation of property. They deny validity to any State legislation professing to be an exercise of police power for protection against evils from abroad, which is beyond the necessity for its exercise wherever it interferes with the rights and powers of the Federal Government.

Tried by this rule the statute of Missouri is a plain intrusion upon the exclusive domain of Congress. It is not a quarantine law. It is not an inspection law. It says to all natural persons and to all transportation companies: "You shall not bring into the State any Texas cattle or any Mexican cattle or Indian cattle between March 1 and December 1, in any year, no matter whether they are free from disease or not; no matter whether they may do an injury to the inhabitants of the State or not; and if you do bring them in, even for the purpose of carrying them through the State without unloading them, you shall be subject to extraordinary liabilities." Such a statute we do not doubt it is beyond the power of a State to enact. To hold otherwise would be to ignore one of the leading objects which the Constitution of the United States was designed to secure.

In coming to such a conclusion, we have not overlooked the decisions of very respectable courts in Illinois, where statutes similar to the one we have before us have been sustained. (Yeazel vs. Alexander, 58 Ill., 254.) Regarding the statutes as mere police regulations, intended to protect domestic cattle against infectious disease, those courts have refused to inquire whether the prohibition did not extend beyond the danger to be apprehended, and whether, therefore, the statutes were not something more than exertions of police power. That inquiry, they have said, was for the Legislature and not for the courts. With this we cannot concur. The police power of a State cannot obstruct foreign commerce or interstate commerce beyond the necessity for its exercise, and under color of it objects not within its scope cannot be secured at the expense of the protection afforded by the Federal Constitution. And as its range sometimes comes very near to the field committed by the Constitution to Congress, it is the duty of the courts to guard vigilantly against any needless intrusion.

These propositions are entirely compatible with my views as to what constitutes a strict rendering of the phraseology and an exact interpretation of the spirit of the section of the Constitution of the United States referred to; and the bill, of which I have the honor to have charge, has been drawn in strict conformity to the ruling of that most eminent tribunal. It is in fact the formulation in a statute of the constitutional doctrine thus authoritatively laid down. I have already shown that there can be no doubt as to the need of regulation; that there can be no logical question as to the necessity of some substantive measure from some source possessing the right and the power to intervene for the protection of the common interests of all in these premises.

And I now offer the opinion of the Supreme Court as pointing out, in phrase which I would not presume to alter, the true and proper source of the required right and power.

In regard to the specific disease mentioned in the bill, as being of such dangerous importance as to require immediate and prompt action on the part of Congress, I beg leave to read an extract from a recent report of the Commissioner of Agriculture to the Forty-fifth Congress, dated in November last:

One of the most dreaded contagious diseases known among cattle is that of pleuro-pneumonia or lung fever. It was brought to this country as early as the year 1843, and has since prevailed to a greater or less extent in several of the Eastern and a few of the Southern States. It made its appearance about a century ago in Central Europe, and has since spread to most European countries. With the exception of rinderpest, it is the most dreaded and destructive disease known among cattle. Unlike Texas cattle fever, which is controlled in our northern latitudes by the appearance of frost, this disease "knows no limitation by winter or summer, cold or heat, rain or drought, high or low latitude." It is the most insidious of all plagues, for the poison may be retained in the system for a period of one or two months, and even for a longer period, in a latent form, and the infected animal in the mean time may be transported from one end of the continent to the other in apparent good health, yet all the while carrying and scattering the seeds of this dreaded pestilence.

Since the appearance of this affection on our shores it has prevailed at different times in the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, and in the District of Columbia. It has recently shown itself at two points in Virginia, (Alexandria and Lynchburgh,) where it was recently prevailing in a virulent form.

All of which States, except perhaps Virginia, have adopted and enforced strict legislative enactments to eradicate and prevent the spread of this distressing disease. These enactments have been confined strictly to an enforcement of those police and quarantine regulations which belong exclusively to the States.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt exclusively with the domestic or interstate aspects of the matter in hand, and I trust that I shall not be deemed egotistic if I say, in behalf of the Committee on Agriculture, in view of the authority cited, that they have exhausted the question of the constitutional right of Congress to enact and of the President to enforce law or laws to the end sought.

I therefore pass to another aspect of the subject, one calculated to command the attention of the representatives of all sections indiscriminately, and much more imperatively, perhaps, than the one already treated; that is to say, the foreign commercial aspect. I can frame no more apt or forcible introduction to this part of my remarks than is embodied in a letter addressed to this House through its honorable Speaker by the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of February 21, 1879, which I will ask to read and incorporate in my remarks. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1879.

SIR: The exportation of live animals has already become an important interest and is rapidly increasing. From statements by the Bureau of Statistics (paper marked "A") which I have the honor to inclose, it appears that the value of the exports of live animals during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878, was nearly eight times the value of such exports during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1868. The value of horned cattle exported from the United States during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878, was $3,896,818, but during the first five months of the current fiscal year the value of such exports was $4,414,000, or $517,182 in excess of the value of the same during the entire preceding year. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1878, nearly 62 per cent. of the cattle exported were shipped to Great Britain, 17½ per cent. to Cuba, and 11 per cent. to British possessions in North America.

On the 18th of December, 1878, a dispatch was received by this Department, through the Department of State, from Liverpool, to the effect that unless cattle shipped from the United States should have the Government health certificate when embarked they would probably be slaughtered on landing.

On the same day I issued to collectors of customs by telegraph a circular authorizing them to cause an inspection to be made of all neat cattle proposed to be shipped to Great Britain, and to issue a certificate that such cattle as shall be shipped are free from all disease. A copy of such circular (marked "B") is transmitted herewith.

On the 1st of February, 1879, I issued a second circular, a copy of which is inclosed, (marked "C,") making imperative such inspection and prohibiting the shipment of cattle without such inspection, and a certificate showing that the cattle shipped are free from disease and requiring collectors of customs to promptly forward to this Department any information which they may be able to obtain of the presence of contagious or infectious diseases prevailing among live animals in their vicinity.

In consequence of a shipment of diseased cattle from the United States to Liverpool, which were found to be infected with the pleuro-pneumonia, the British government has deemed it necessary to make very stringent regulations for preventing the introduction of diseased animals into their ports. The powers of this Department have been exhausted, if not transcended, by the orders contained in the two circulars already issued. I deem it proper, therefore, to recommend that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized by suitable legislation to prohibit or restrict, in such manner as he may think proper, the exportation of live animals from the United States to foreign countries whenever it shall appear to his satisfaction that any contagious or infectious diseases exist among such animals in the United States, and that he have authority to appoint such skilled persons as may be necessary to inspect animals for exportation and to examine into questions connected with the diseases of animals under such regulations as he may prescribe. After a conference with the Secretary of State, who heartily concurs in supporting the proposed measure, I submit a draught of a bill containing such provisions.

The powers conferred thereby upon the Secretary of the Treasury are very liberal, but not more so than the authority conferred upon him by section 2493 of the Revised Statutes relating to the importation of neat cattle.

By that section the importation of neat cattle from any foreign country into the United States is prohibited, with the proviso in substance that the operation of the section shall be suspended or modified at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury under such regulations as he shall deem proper.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

CIRCULAR.—EXPORTATION OF CATTLE TO GREAT BRITAIN.

[1878. Department No. 139. Secretary's Office.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1878.

To collectors of customs and others:

The following dispatch has been received by cable, through the Department of State, from Liverpool:

"Unless cattle shipped from United States have Government health certificate when embarked, slaughter probably compulsory on landing, paralyzing trade. Can you cable Welsh assurance appointment veterinary officers at sea-ports?"

You are authorized to cause an inspection to be made of all neat cattle proposed to be shipped from your port to Great Britain, and to issue your certificate that such cattle as shall be shipped are free from all disease, and that there is no known disease in cattle at your port, or in its neighborhood.

In States in which there are officers authorized by law to examine into the diseases of cattle, the collector may avail himself of their services, as the basis of his action, at the expense of the shippers.

By order.

Very respectfully,

H. F. FRENCH,
Assistant Secretary.

CIRCULAR.—INFORMATION IN REGARD TO CATTLE DISEASE.

[1879. Department No. 23. Secretary's Office.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 1, 1879.

To collectors of customs and others:

By Department's circular of December 18, 1878, it was directed that live cattle shipped from the various ports of the United States might be examined with reference to the question whether they were free from contagious diseases, and that if found to be free from such diseases, a certificate to that effect should be given.

By that circular such inspection was not made compulsory, but the certificate was to be issued only upon the application of parties interested.

As the export trade in live cattle from the United States is of vital importance to large interests, every precaution should be taken to guard against the shipment of diseased animals abroad, and such a guarantee given as will satisfy foreign countries, especially Great Britain, that no risk will ensue from such shipments of communicating contagious or infectious diseases to the animals in foreign countries by shipments from the United States.

Collectors of customs are, therefore, instructed that in no case will live animals be permitted to be shipped from their respective ports until after an inspection of the animals with reference to their freedom from disease, and the issuance of a certificate showing that they are free from the class of diseases mentioned.

Notice of rejected cattle should be promptly given to this Department.

In order that this Department may be fully informed in regard to such diseases in any part of the United States collectors of customs are requested to promptly forward to this Department any information which they may be able to obtain of the presence of contagious or infectious diseases prevailing among live animals in their vicinity.

It is probable that if the disease prevails to any considerable extent it will be noticed in the local press, and collectors are requested to send copies of any such notices to this Department for its information.

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

The importance of our export trade in cattle, Mr. Speaker, is too eloquently and too clearly set forth in the phrase and numerals of the Secretary of the Treasury to require any added comment from me. A traffic which has expanded in value in ten years from less than one million to nearly six millions of dollars per annum is clearly worth all consistent efforts that may be required to preserve its present status and foster its further growth. The attempts of the Secretary to employ the powers vested in him by existing law for the protection and promotion of this traffic and to meet the requirements of the foreign governments under whose auspices we find our market are no less praiseworthy than his confession that, in his excess of zeal for the welfare of our commerce, he may have transcended those powers is frank.

Would that the history of our country afforded no instance of the transcending of lawful powers by officials of our Government in a less praiseworthy cause or for a less salutary object! Would that in every instance the transcending might be so frankly confessed with such assurance of full if not grateful pardon!

The Secretary, be this as it may, asks additional powers, or rather asks that wider scope and clearer definition be given to the powers already vested in him by law.

To meet this request of the Secretary is a part, and an important part, of the object of this bill. But in order to meet all the requirements suggested by the Secretary touching the welfare of our export trade in cattle, it is necessary to establish a suitable system of sanitary regulations at home.

A healthy commerce between the States is in this case an imperative prerequisite to a healthy exportation. Obviously the port regulations suggested by the Secretary, and which the action of foreign governments has rendered a sine qua non, must be to a great extent negatived, or, what is worse, transformed into positive obstructions to commerce, unless they are made a part of a comprehensive system reaching to the remotest regions of production. To enact the port regulations without providing barriers against the shipment of diseased stock from the interior to the seaboard would be like applying a sticking-plaster to the head of a cancer, leaving its roots to riot throughout the body of the patient; would be, in short, the most ridiculous legislative quackery, to borrow a medical term.

I wish that necessity for immediate action were not so imperative, for in that case I should like to take more time and make a more elaborate presentation of the intimate logical connection which exists between the particular measures of local protection so vainly essayed by the Legislature of my own State, and the general regulations for the protection of our export trade at large, recommended by the Secretary. But this is an extraordinary session of Congress, and in my judgment nothing external to the specialties for which it was called should be considered, except such matters as are absolutely vital to the interests and relief of the people at this moment and which cannot be deferred until next winter without great detriment to the public welfare.

Between this time and the regular session vast numbers of cattle will be moved from the interior to the seaboard. The import regulations of Great Britain will be rigidly enforced, and, as pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, these regulations, in the absence of coincident precautions on our side, will militate seriously against not only the expansion of our cattle export in volume, but also against the reputation of our beef product in that great market. These, Mr. Speaker, are the outlines of the reasons why this bill should be passed, and passed at once. I have stated them with almost negligent brevity, because I am unwilling at such a stage of an extraordinary session to consume the time of the House with elaboration of a theme which seems to me to carry its own argument with it upon the barest statement of leading facts and main propositions.

In default of elaboration of my own I would refer those who seek more specific information to the able and exhaustive letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture to the chairman of the committee on that subject of the Senate, dated February 14, 1879, and numbered Mis. Doc. No. 71.

For the rest I shall be glad to entertain any suggestions or respond so far as I may to any objections that may be urged by members of the House. I ask only the attention which the commercial importance of the subject-matter entitles it to, and only the consideration which the vastness of the interests involved may seem to demand.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COVERT,] chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Speaker, the preparation of a bill for submission to this House which shall meet the demands made upon us for prompt, full, and effective action in this matter, has been a work involving the utmost difficulty and delicacy. The sub-committee in charge of the bill have, I know, expended much time and labor in perfecting the measure which has received the sanction of a majority of the Committee on Agriculture, and which has been reported by that committee to the House. I regret that I cannot see my way clear to concur with the very large majority of my associates on the committee in all the conclusions embodied in the bill so reported and now under discussion.

In their work of framing this proposed act the committee were at once confronted with the constitutional difficulties standing in the way of making any measure effective perhaps in the way of full and perfect relief. It was at once determined that the Federal Congress had power only to pass laws in this connection to regulate commerce between our own and other nations and between the various States of the Union.

So far as they could, with constitutional limitations barring their way to a fuller and more perfect law, the committee, in the bill reported, have taken hold of and have treated the questions of the foreign exportation of cattle and their transit from State to State. Every safeguard has been thrown around the matter of cattle transportation which could be invoked under the peculiar and embarrassing circumstances suggested. In fact, one of my objections to the bill is that it contains some useless and impractical provisions, provisions which seem to me at all events to be superfluous. I shall point out and comment upon these provisions of the bill which seem to me to be unnecessary before I conclude.

I assume, sir, that there can be no possible objection from any source to the three first sections of the bill, making it a misdemeanor for the owners or custodians of animals afflicted with infectious or contagious diseases to send these animals from one State to another, and prohibiting the reception and transit of such animals by common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. The requirement is that persons so engaged shall know that animals are suffering from disease before the penalty shall attach.

The committee have exercised great care and given much attention to the framing of provisions in the bill submitted as to the exportation of cattle to foreign markets.

Our cattle trade with Great Britain has grown to vast proportions, and under all ordinary circumstances would continue to increase year by year. The importance of so guarding and nourishing this trade as that it may be continued and increased cannot be overestimated. It has been to us a source of national pride that our own country has so largely supplied the markets of Great Britain with American cattle. Not a citizen of this country, whether directly engaged in or benefited by this exportation or not, who does not desire to see this trade preserved and enlarged.

We have every reason to suppose that the English people have been extremely anxious to keep up this trade and to avail themselves of its benefits. While they have been driven by necessity to almost close their markets to the cattle exporters of many other nations by reason of the introduction of infectious diseases from abroad, they have not, until a recent date, placed any severe restrictions upon the exportation of cattle from this country. But Great Britain has had a grievous experience in the matter of contagious diseases among her domestic animals, and almost invariably as the result of the importations she has made from abroad. Her records, going back to the year 810, show that when the French army returned from its expedition against the Danes it was followed by the cattle murrain, which in the same year spread across the channel and entered Britain. From 1223 to 1225 the bovine plague passed through Hungary, Austria, Italy, and Germany into the British isles.

In 1714 a distemper known as the cow-pox plague, having raged throughout almost the whole of Europe, broke out in England as the result of the importation of cattle from beyond her borders. The loss in other parts of Europe was almost incalculable. Vast herds were swept away as by magic, and untold suffering followed as the result of these losses. One authority states that the ravages of the disease were so fearful that in the three first years of the attack one million five hundred thousand head of cattle perished in Europe. But the English authorities acted with commendable promptitude. A commission was appointed. Stringent regulations were adopted, involving the immediate killing of all animals affected with disease, disinfection, and quarantine, and as the result of these summary measures the disease was soon driven out of England.

From this time almost constantly down to 1745 contagious and infectious diseases among domestic animals prevailed in many parts of Europe. They seemed to follow in the trail of war, and gave additional horrors to the ordinary results of warfare.

By the exercise of care Great Britain escaped any visitation of the plague until the year last named, when what is called the steppe murrain, having previously penetrated the Tyrol and broken out in Germany and Holland, passed from the latter country into England. Here it continued to rage for twelve years. In the third year after its inception eighty thousand cattle were slaughtered beside those which died of the disease. In the fourth year of the plague they were destroyed at the rate of seven thousand per month, and until—as the historian of the period asserts, from the numerous impositions that were practiced from the system of remuneration made to owners—this part of the preventive regulations was suspended.

From 1757 down to 1769 cattle plagues prevailed in various parts of Europe—Austria and Holland suffering great losses by reason of their presence, and the cattle markets of England were constantly threatened with the disorder.

In the year last named the distemper, still the kind known as the steppe murrain, broke out in Scotland, one authority stating that it first appeared in a sea-port town, where it was communicated to cattle by some packages of hay imported from Holland. The sturdy Scotch magistrates lost little time in deliberation. They simply met and resolved to kill every head of cattle in and around the neighborhood, infected and not infected, binding themselves to see that compensation was made to owners; and this summary course was promptly followed.

A little over twenty years ago the Russian cattle plague made its appearance in England, entailing heavy losses upon the owners of cattle. In Australia this particular disease, pleuro-pneumonia or lung fever, appeared some twenty years ago, and its effects have been particularly damaging and distressing. The immediate losses were very heavy, and large sums were expended in the effort to arrest the progress of the plague. It spread, however, eventually to the large cattle ranges, and thus passed to great extent beyond control. It is feared that the disease can now never be eradicated, and that Australia will never again be the great cattle-producing country that it once was. This very disease, from its first introduction in England down to this time, has cost the people of that country, it has been estimated, the enormous sum of $5,000,000,000.

I have given this brief résumé of the facts in connection with diseases among domestic animals abroad for several reasons: first, to show that the present visitation of disease among American cattle is not by any means what may be regarded as a strange or in one sense an exceptional condition; secondly, to show that we have to guide us, in our efforts to suppress and exterminate the disorder, the experiences and practices of other nations under like conditions; and, thirdly, to show that the English government, in the face of what I believe to be exaggerated reports as to the nature and extent of the disease with us, has exhibited a liberality of action in connection with our export trade which is generous in the extreme, and which calls for reciprocity on our part in every direction where reciprocity can be exercised.

The English privy council only a few weeks ago issued amended orders relative to the reception of American cattle. Briefly stated, these orders permit cattle from this country to be received at the port of London, where they may be transhipped from the vessel in which they are brought to another vessel for conveyance to the foreign animals' wharf under certain regulations comparatively simple in their nature.

I have said that I believed the reports as to the nature and extent of this disease among our cattle at this time to be exaggerated. I believe that these reports have been magnified to some extent at least by cattle exporters beyond the limits of the United States, with the view to restrict and lessen the exportation of American cattle to England. Various circumstances might be stated in support of this conclusion. Only a few days ago dispatches were received here through the State Department, embodying a report of the principal of the new veterinary college of Edinburgh, of an examination recently made by him in this direction. It was an examination of certain portions of lungs removed from some American cattle slaughtered at or near Liverpool, on which it was reported to him that the veterinary officers of the privy council had given an opinion that the lungs presented the characteristic signals of pleuro-pneumonia. After the most careful examination this high authority asserts that there was no appearance of this disease, but that the animals had suffered from a disease which had originated during transit. Further examination by some of the most distinguished veterinarians of Scotland has only confirmed the truth of this assertion.

It seems to me, sir, that too great care cannot be exercised in the matter of the treatment of animals during their transit across the ocean. It cannot be doubted that cattle are constantly being shipped from this country to England in steamers with closed hatches. They necessarily, during their transit of three thousand miles of water, breathe over and over again the close, vitiated air of their confined quarters. Can we wonder that when they are disembarked they give every indication of lung fever and that the veterinary authorities, fearing the contagion, hastily pronounce the disease "pleuro-pneumonia?" Is it any wonder that the English government has adopted the restrictive measures it has? Until ship-owners and our cattle exporters can see to it and do see to it that better means of transit are provided and more care is shown in the treatment of animals in transit, just so long will we have cable dispatches from time to time as to the supposed existence of this disease among our native cattle abroad.

I have not the slightest doubt, sir, from the kindly feeling shown by the English government and by the whole English people upon this question of the exportation of American cattle, that if prompt and full measures of protection are employed by our own Government, very soon every restrictive provision governing the exportation of our animals to Great Britain will be removed.

We have more than forty million head of cattle in the United States, vastly more than we need for our own purposes. This is a production which must seek foreign markets. We owe to the great industry involved in this exportation, to the enterprising class of people who are directly engaged in it, the fullest and most perfect measures of protection. We owe to the people of Great Britain, whose herds have so often been reduced by foreign disease—we owe to that people who in spite of these visitations and these losses are still desirous to continue their cattle trade with us—the introduction of the strongest preventive measures and the establishment of the securest safeguards against the introduction of contagion from this country.

It is of course impossible, sir, to legislate in advance upon every detail of a large and important matter of this character. It is impossible to foresee what the exigencies of any particular occasion in this connection may be.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me that the sub-committee have acted wisely in conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury the wide discretionary powers committed to his Department by sections 7, 8, and 9 of the proposed bill. This important work goes naturally to this particular Department. Under existing regulations, one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury is charged with the general supervision of the work assigned to the divisions of customs, special agents, internal revenue, and navigation, and the Marine Hospital Service. The familiarity acquired by this officer of the Department with these general duties will well fit him to comprehend the needs and suggest the regulations indicated in this portion of the proposed act.

While, Mr. Speaker, I join with the majority of my committee in expressing the heartiest desire that the sections of the bill I have quoted should be enacted into law, I am yet forced to dissent from the views of the majority as embodied in the fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of the bill. These sections in brief provide for the appointment by the Commissioner of Agriculture of inspectors of live cattle received at such localities as he may select on lines of interstate communication where he may have information the disease exists. The duties of these inspectors are to inspect all live cattle received at such localities for shipment or passing through the same in transitu from one State or Territory to another. Additional provision is made for the appointment of a limited number of "medical and veterinary practitioners" for special duty whenever the Commissioner shall deem such appointment necessary. All these officers are to act under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner may establish.

I may be pardoned, sir, if I express the belief that the legislation contemplated by these three sections is wholly unnecessary and that the enactment of these provisions would entail a far greater amount of injury than benefit.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the bill give the Commissioner of Agriculture more power than any other man in the country would have?

Mr. COVERT. I say with emphasis and in Italics, yes; but my objection to the retention of these sections of the proposed bill goes further than to the bestowal of perhaps arbitrary power upon any one man or any one head of a department. Before I conclude I will state what my main objections are.

We cannot legislate satisfactorily upon this matter unless we know something of the nature of the disease involved and the extent of its growth in this country. Its history with us can be very briefly stated. It was originally introduced here over thirty years ago, having been brought here from Germany, and first manifested itself in my own State of New York.

Ten years ago some cattle were imported from Holland by a resident of Massachusetts. These cattle were infected with pleuro-pneumonia, and the disease spread rapidly throughout the State. It was so destructive and fatal in its results that the Legislature was speedily convened in special session to consider the matter. A commission was appointed to investigate, and an act was passed for its extirpation. The act provided that all infected animals should be killed and buried, the State making compensation to owners for the loss sustained. More than one thousand animals were killed, and a large amount of money, nearly $75,000, I think, was expended in subduing the disease and in making compensation to the owners of condemned animals.

Mr. CLAFLIN. More than that sum.

Mr. COVERT. My friend from Massachusetts says that even a larger sum was thus expended, and he has closer knowledge of the matter than I.

The State of New York has acted promptly in the matter. Her Legislature has passed a law intended to stamp out the disease, and this law is now being actively enforced.

The disease has appeared from time to time not only in Massachusetts and New York but in Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia. Continuing our criticism upon the sections of the bill under discussion, let us see what is the nature of this disease. What are the indications of its presence which the inspectors contemplated by this bill are supposed to be able to distinguish? Professor Armitage describes the disease as highly contagious. It occurs in two forms—apparent, in which the symptoms are of a serious nature; and latent, which is difficult to detect, having an incubative stage which varies from two to six weeks, but as a rule makes itself apparent within forty days. It seems a singular fact, but its correctness is borne out by expert testimony, that the symptoms during incubation are general improvement of condition, doubtless due to the influence of the poison involved in the disease on the blood of the animal.

Professor Simonds, a distinguished English authority upon the subject of diseases among animals, when examined as a witness before a comparatively recent Parliamentary committee, being asked, "Is it your opinion that from the very first moment the disease attacks the animal it is contagious?" replied, "I believe it is so."

In the first international veterinary congress held at Hamburg in 1863, Professor Gerlach, speaking of pleuro-pneumonia, said: "Owing to the lengthened period of incubation, natural to this disease, its contagion may be spread before outward symptoms are visible."

From these statements it can readily be seen that the inspection proposed by the pending bill cannot, from the very nature of the circumstances, produce any substantial or satisfactory results. Consider the conditions. The cattle are possibly overheated, nervous, disturbed—not in their normal condition—by reason of a possibly long journey. On some of our large lines of railway from one hundred to two hundred car-loads of cattle are transported each day, each car containing from twelve to eighteen cattle. This makes an aggregate of twelve or eighteen hundred cattle to be inspected each day at each point on some of our main lines of road. The estimate has been made that allowing but eight minutes for each animal, this would take seven experts ten hours of constant labor to go over the day's arrivals at one point. If but one inspector was appointed at each point, his examination must be of a wholesale and worthless character, or the whole cattle traffic where this inspection is invoked must be destroyed.

If it is impossible, or at best exceedingly difficult, to ascertain the existence of this disease in its latent stage when the animals are quietly grazing in the fields, will it not be utterly impossible to make anything like a correct diagnosis when the animals are in transitu under the conditions I have attempted to describe?

I assume that the provisions I am criticising are intended to apply more particularly perhaps to cattle shipped from the East to the West. I have no statistics showing the extent of shipments in this direction, but it is safe to assume that if these sections of the bill are passed, wherever a head of cattle may be shipped in any direction by rail—wherever a cow shall be—there also will be United States inspectors to the full limit permitted by the law. Just so long as this is permitted to continue, just so long will every breeze that blows from the East or from the West bear to us exaggerated reports of the continued existence of this disease.

In 1865 the second international veterinary congress was held in Vienna. So important had the subject of diseases among domestic animals become that nearly every civilized government sent skilled and expert representatives to attend the session of this congress. The questions of the growth and spread of infectious diseases among animals and the means of prevention were fully and elaborately discussed. This very subject, the question of the treatment of animals while in transit on railways during seasons of contagion, especially received careful attention and discussion.

During the whole of the protracted debate upon this topic, the system of inspection and examination of animals by experts or inspectors was not once alluded to or even suggested in the remotest way. Why this omission? Why was it that in this body of scientists called together for the express purpose of deliberating upon this question, of coming to some conclusion upon it, and of giving to the world the benefit of their conclusions, why was it that there was a complete and utter and absolute silence in this regard? We can only assume that these scientists and experts regarded this system as being so entirely useless and worthless that it did not receive even passing comment. The assembly did, however, insist upon the absolute necessity of cleanliness in the means of transit and it went so far into detail as to discuss and determine the nature of the disinfectants to be employed and the methods to be observed in the process.

The Austrian ministries of state and commerce several years ago promulgated a brief and comprehensive law upon this subject providing in plain and simple language that cars used for the transportation of animals should be thoroughly cleansed after use, and other governments may have adopted similar regulations or rules in this general direction. It seems to me that this is as far as we should go upon this branch of the subject.

The inspection proposed by the pending bill will not only work possible serious injury and loss of time to producers and railroad companies but it will call for the appointment of a class of useless officials to be paid from the national Treasury whose utmost efforts could result, it seems to me, in no real good but in much possible harm.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Many MEMBERS. "Go on!" "Go on!"

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the gentleman will continue.

Mr. COVERT. I thank the House for its courtesy.

I am asked how harm could come from the action of these inspectors. If, as the result of their examination, animals are permitted to proceed in transit, there goes with them the implied assurance at least that they are free from disease. They may have the disease in its latent stage, the form in which it may defy detection. Having successfully passed the examination of the inspectors, care and caution in the management of the animals—observation of their condition—would possibly be relaxed by those having them in charge. Cattle-owners in the various States, relying upon the enactment of this form of general legislation, will be less zealous for the enactment of stringent local laws. Great difficulty will be experienced in the framing of such regulations as will protect the rights of the individual citizen if his property shall be seized and condemned by Federal inspectors. I trust that these provisions may be stricken out; but if their substance is retained, then I trust that a commission representing more than one interest may be named in the bill for the promulgation and enforcement of the regulations.

Mr. Speaker, the gist of this whole matter seems to me to lie in this: In some sections of this country we have, unhappily, the disease of pleuro-pneumonia among our cattle. I believe the reports coming to us from the so-called infected districts are exaggerated; but still the disease exists to some extent. No form of law which this Congress can pass will be effectual to fully crush out the disease. We cannot, by any right action on our part, have Federal officers go into the several States and deal summarily and effectively in this matter. The history of this distemper in every country where it has prevailed demonstrates that there is but one way in which to eradicate the disease. This is known as the "stamping-out" process. It calls for the quickest action and the most summary measures. Nothing but the immediate killing of the animals affected, the disinfection of the premises where sickness prevails, and the establishment of a cordon around the infected district—nothing but these measures can eradicate the disease and prevent its growth. Every veterinarian of character and reputation who has closely watched this disease is emphatic and pronounced in the expression of this opinion. We must rely upon the voices which come to us from those who have made this matter a specialty. Again, I repeat, no form of Federal legislation can be made to bring about the desired result.

To the several States in which this disease has appeared or where the dread visitation may come—to the States alone must be committed the work of eradication. Every consideration of sound policy and of constitutional law favors local legislation in this particular. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has already made and New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and my own State of New York are now making successful local efforts to crush out every form of this disease.

It is the universal experience in all legislation of this character that it is easier to hold local agents to a strict accountability than those appointed by Federal authority. It is the experience of all of us that in legislation involving the possible condemnation of private property the action of our local law-makers meets with the quickest and kindest and heartiest response from our home people. Apart from any other consideration, I submit that it is not fair, that it would not be equitable for the citizens of the State of New York or the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or for the people of other States where local action has been had, after they have at cost and trouble to themselves eradicated disease from among their own cattle, to be obliged to defray in part the expense of ridding other States from contagion—States where the authorities have listlessly allowed disease to appear and to remain within their borders, and have finally summoned up only sufficient energy to petition the Federal Congress to come to their relief. It is safe to assume that the less we have of Federal legislation in this matter the stronger and better will be the local law for the suppression of this disease in the several States.

Finally, sir, I submit that when we have passed this proposed act, amended in the particulars I have endeavored to suggest, leaving to the individual States the work of shaping legislation within their own borders, and giving to other countries with which we deal the fullest assurance that their interests and their rights will be protected, we have, so far as this whole matter is concerned, done all that we can do legitimately and constitutionally.

Mr. McGOWAN obtained the floor.

CORRECTION OF TITLE OF A BILL.

Mr. KENNA. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McGOWAN] to yield one moment that I may present a privileged report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States, (the Senate concurring,) That the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to change and correct the title of House bill No. 1999, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes,' approved March 4, 1879," as passed by the two Houses of Congress at the present session, by striking out the word "fourth" which occurs therein and inserting in lieu thereof the word "third."

Mr. KENNA. I desire to state that by a mistake in printing the last river and harbor bill the word "fourth" appears in the date of the President's approval of the bill instead of the "third." In drawing the bill passed at this session, amendatory of the act of last session, that act was referred to as approved March 4, 1879, when in fact it was approved March 3, 1879. The object of this resolution is simply to correct the reference to the act of which the bill of this session is amendatory. I hope the resolution will pass without objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. KENNA moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CATTLE DISEASES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill relating to the exportation of diseased cattle, &c.

Mr. MORTON. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McGOWAN] yield to me?

Mr. McGOWAN. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have read by the Clerk an interesting letter received from the secretary of the New York State Agricultural Society in relation to the measure now under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK STATE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY,
Albany, May 17, 1879.

DEAR SIR: I beg to thank you for your kind note of the 14th instant, and for the interest you take in this, to us, very important subject of cattle diseases. I am emboldened thereby to address you in regard to the bill (H. R. No. 1378) which I observe has been made a special order for Tuesday next, and which seems to me perfectly frivolous and ineffective in its proposed treatment of the subject. To specify as briefly as possible, I remark:

1. That, as to the first three sections of the bill, it deals only with the question of the transportation of diseased cattle, and as to this, it is, in the first place, extremely improbable that diseased cattle will ever be offered or accepted for transportation; and, in the second place, this is not the danger to be guarded against, the real danger being that infected cattle will be scattered about the country, the owners desiring to get them off their hands before the disease becomes apparent, and these cattle carrying the seeds of disease with them and forming new centers of infection wherever they find new homes. The risk, moreover, as regards pleuro-pneumonia, is entirely with cows and steers, not with beef cattle intended for immediate slaughter.

2. The fourth, fifth, and sixth sections of the bill empower the Commissioner of Agriculture to establish a system of inspection, to appoint inspectors and scientific experts, &c., but, even supposing that we should have (as we never yet have had) a Commissioner of Agriculture competent to any such important duty, it is only to prevent the transportation of diseased (actually sick) cattle that his inspection is to apply, and this is not the real danger, especially not as regards public lines of transportation, and, moreover, the limited number of agents and the insignificant sum mentioned render it impossible that any effective result could be attained. Our own State, I may observe, has already in the present year appropriated $35,000 for the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia. Besides, in the absence of State laws, what is to become of the cattle found to be diseased?

3. Sections 7, 8, and 9 seem only to re-enact provisions or regulations already in force as to exportation of cattle; but these are of no practical importance, because Great Britain will not take our live cattle so long as we are "an infected country" though they be covered from head to tail with certificates.

4. Section 10 very properly provides for the appearance of diseases in the District of Columbia in almost the exact terms of our New York statute and seems to me to be the only part of the bill that is worth anything.

The question, then, as it appears to me, is, how can Congress deal with this question effectively, practically, and constitutionally? And having given a great deal of thought to this matter of cattle diseases for the past ten years with reference to the legislation of New York, and recently considering it with reference to the relations of the several States and of the General Government to the subject, I venture to say that as within the States its treatment ought to be left entirely to the State authorities, and that the practical and only useful way in which the General Government can act is to take measures to secure efficient action by the several States involved, and, if possible, harmonious action. This is the real problem. The States are fully capable of dealing sucessfully with the subject if they will only do so. It seems to me that it is the proper function of the General Government to provide that if any State is so apathetic or so ill-advised as to neglect or refuse to extend proper protection to her own citizens (as regards themselves as well as their herds) in this matter of epizoötic diseases, that State shall at least be restrained from doing harm to adjoining States and to their people by being absolutely interdicted, so long as she fails of her duty, from sending any live animals out of her territory; and I venture to assert that this simple, temporarily severe, remedy will be found to be the most effective, the least burdensome, and the most easy of application that can be devised. In my opinion the absolute seclusion or quarantine of a State, to be raised and removed as soon as her authorities gave proper assurances that she would thenceforth discharge her duties and respect her obligations, would be so instantaneous in its effect that the public would hardly have time to realize that it had been prescribed.

I would, therefore, for the sake of brevity, present in rough outline the provisions of a law of Congress embodying the views above briefly suggested:

1. Such a law should empower and require the President, whenever it comes to his knowledge (by the complaint perhaps of the authorities of an adjoining State, by the medium of the National Board of Health, through the Commissioner of Agriculture, or in any other way) that infectious or contagious disease of domestic animals exists in any State, and that the State authorities are not taking proper and effective measures to control and suppress it, to issue his proclamation declaring such State an infected State and prohibiting the removal of any domestic animals and of all articles liable to convey infection from that State into any other State, country, or Territory.

2. All animals, &c., removed in violation of such proclamation to be forfeited and to be liable to be taken by the authorities into whose territory they come; if sick or noxious, to be destroyed; if not, to be sold.

3. Authorize the President to employ agents and assistants, but devolve the duty so far as possible on the United States marshals and their deputies, except where the States sought to be protected have already proper organization and sufficient force to attend to the matter.

4. Provide that all expenses beyond what may be met by the proceeds of forfeited cattle shall be paid as the expenses of United States marshals and similar officers are paid, but all accounts to be certified by the President or his principal assistant.

5. Provide for annulling such proclamations as soon as proper assurances shall be given that they may safely be rescinded.

I am aware, my dear sir, that this sketch is a very rough one, but I hope you will give some consideration to the views I have presented, for the bill now proposed is really, without question in my mind, worse than useless, and so far as I am aware no plan has yet been proposed that promises to accomplish the result desired.

Yours, very respectfully,

T. L. HARISON,
Secretary.

Hon. LEVI P. MORTON.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. McGOWAN. I will if that be the wish of the House.

Mr. WHITE. I move, then, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifty-three minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. McKINLEY: The petition of Hon. David Boyce and 149 others, members of the Christian Temperance Union of East Liverpool, Ohio, that no change be made in the revenue laws concerning the sale and manufacture of spirituous liquors promotive of the interest of dealers in the same—to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. RYAN, of Kansas: The petition of settlers on the frontier lands of Kansas, for the extension of the term in which payment of the same is required under the pre-emption laws—to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, the petition of citizens of Kansas, for a post-route from Lacrosse to Wakeeney, via West Point, Hampton, Elm Valley, and Bright Spring Creek, Kansas—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WELLS: Memorial of the American Society of Engineers at Saint Louis, Missouri, relative to the proposed Mississippi River improvement commission—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of citizens of California, for a post-route from Burnt Ranch to New River, California—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 6, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF RIVER AND HARBOR ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 435) to correct the reading of "an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879.

Mr. HOUSTON. In the river and harbor bill of the last Congress the name of a river proposed to be surveyed is put by mistake as "Chattahoochee," when it ought to be Choctawhatchee. This bill proposes to make that correction. There is another mistake in the title and in the body of the bill. In referring to the approval of the river and harbor bill it says that it was approved on the 4th of March, when in truth it was approved on the 3d of March. I ask permission of the Senate to make the amendment so as to strike out the "4th" and put in the "3d." The object is simply to secure the survey of the water-course originally intended.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator state what the fact is about the bill; whether the original bill was actually approved on the 4th or on the 3d of March?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have had an examination made by one of the gentlemen at the desk, and it turns out that it was approved on the 3d of March.

Mr. DAWES. So that the mistake is in the print?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I agree to that I wish the Senator from Alabama would send to the Secretary's desk and let us hear read that portion of the act that he wishes to amend. This is a very dangerous method of passing bills; but I dislike to do anything that the Senator from Alabama might think would delay the Choctawhatchee survey.

The Chief Clerk read from section 2 of the river and harbor act as follows:

Chattahoochie River, Alabama, from Geneva to Newton.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to strike out "fourth" and insert "third" where it occurs in the body of the bill as to the date of approval of the act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, the title was amended by striking out "four" and inserting "three," so as to read "approved March 3, 1879."

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the title is being amended I wish the Senator from Alabama would allow the Senate to further amend the title by making it read "a bill to correct an error in" instead of "to correct the reading of" which is a very awkward expression and rather a novel one.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that amendment to the title will be made.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LAMAR. The Select Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries have instructed me to report back with certain amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1847) to provide for the appointment of a "Mississippi River commission," for the improvement of said river from the head of the passes, near its mouth, to its headwaters. I give notice that I shall call the bill up for its passage at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. LAMAR. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) accepting from Professor Edward Fontaine, of Louisiana, certain maps, drawings, and explanations of the same, to report it without amendment and recommend its passage. This resolution was passed by the Senate at the last session and failed in the other House; I presume for want of time. The committee, however, recommend also that before the passage of the resolution it be referred to the Committee on Printing, in order to get an estimate of the expense of the printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so referred.

DISTRICT WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. ROLLINS. The Committee on the District of Columbia instruct me to report the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and hereby is, authorized to sit during the recess of Congress to investigate the best means of securing to the city of Washington an ample supply of pure water, and to ascertain what the water-works now in use, including the aqueduct, reservoirs, water-mains, &c., have cost the United States, the District of Columbia, and the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and what additional expenditure will be necessary, if any, to secure an ample supply of pure water; and that the committee report to the Senate by bill or otherwise at the next session of Congress.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "recess of Congress" and inserting "next recess of the Senate." I should be sorry to give the Committee on the District of Columbia a power to sit perpetually in all recesses of Congress, and I suppose that is not the intention of the Senator. I suppose the point is to sit during the next recess of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. There will be no objection, I think, to the modification.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course there is not any objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that modification will be made. The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to amend also so as to provide for the committee reporting, not merely the expense of these water-works to the United States, but also the income that has been derived from those water-works year by year, and also all the outstanding indebtedness of any kind that has relation to the water-works so as to cover the whole subject.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no objection to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not suppose there would be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator send his amendment to the desk?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend by inserting after the words "United States," in the ninth line, these words:

And also the annual income that has been earned therefrom, and how much thereof has been realized, and also the present state of all outstanding debts or liabilities relating to said works.

Mr. ROLLINS. There is no objection to the amendment. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. The mover of the resolution accepts the modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It being a report from a committee, he cannot accept an amendment. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WHYTE. What am I to understand by the use of the word "earned?" Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to mean the net income or the gross amount of water rents received?

Mr. EDMUNDS. By the word "earned" I meant all that the water works have properly charged to consumers, &c.; then, following that, I desire to know how much of all that has been earned has been actually paid. I want one table that will show how much the water works on the rates imposed have actually been entitled to receive, and then I wish to know, second, how much of that which they were entitled to receive has been actually realized.

Mr. WHYTE. Would it not be better to use the words "either realized" or "actually received" after the word "earned?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have proposed to ask first, how much has been earned, second, how much has been realized of that which has been earned. I should be glad to have it stated more clearly if it can be.

Mr. WHYTE. The word "earned" is rather a technical expression. It means what has actually been made, as I have always understood, over and above expenses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no. I thought the earnings of a man were what he had been entitled to receive from his labor or whatever business he was in. Then how much of his earnings he had been actually able to secure out of his employer would be another thing. But if the Senator will suggest a better word than "earned," I will take it most gladly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Secretary read the first clause of the resolution again. I think it is limited to the city of Washington alone. We ought to have an inquiry cover the whole works.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be, and hereby is, authorized to sit during the next recess of the Senate to investigate the best means of securing to the city of Washington an ample supply of pure water, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether that ought not to include "Georgetown" or whatever is the proper phrase.

Mr. ROLLINS. I think Georgetown should be included.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would "Washington and Georgetown" cover the whole use of the water-works?

Mr. ROLLINS. I think it would.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not Uniontown get any?

Mr. ROLLINS. I think not. I think "Washington and Georgetown" would cover the whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I suggest the addition of the words "and Georgetown" after "the city of Washington" so as to cover both of the cities.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GROOME asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 662) for the relief of William C. Spencer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 663) granting a pension to John J. Fritschy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 664) for the relief of Lieutenant-Colonel Schuyler Hamilton, late United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 665) to prevent obstructions to pre-emption and homestead settlement of the public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 666) relating to the public lands of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 667) to provide for the building of a marine hospital at the entrance to Cedar Key Harbor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 668) granting a pension to James J. Faught, late of Company D, Eighth Missouri Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHANGES OF SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. CALL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to offer an amendment to House joint resolution No. 1, being a joint resolution to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879, which passed the House, came to the Senate, was amended and returned to the House, and has been amended there and again returned to the Senate. I now desire to offer an amendment to that, and ask that the amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I trust the committee will take notice of this amendment. It is to pay certain estimates for transporting the mails, and which have been audited and allowed by the Post-Office Department, as will be found in the executive documents.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is hardly necessary to state it, but I will, for the information of the Senator especially, state that this joint resolution has passed both Houses, and it is not now, properly speaking, a deficiency bill. Though the committee will take it into consideration, I say this for the information of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and be printed.

THE COINAGE.

Mr. COKE. As the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance is present, I wish to ask him a question if it is in order. I should like to ask if the Committee on Finance have acted upon House bill No. 564, being a bill to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and to coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes?

Mr. BAYARD. I am not sure, Mr. President, how far I am warranted in speaking of the action of the committee. The custom of the Senate, I believe, is that the committee should make known its action to the Senate by its reports. I would rather in this case, in the presence of such an unbroken custom, have the consent of my colleagues on the committee before I give an answer which would disclose to the Senator exactly what has occurred in the committee on that subject. I have been instructed to make no report to the Senate on the subject, nor has any member of the committee been so instructed. I feel some embarrassment in speaking in regard to what occurred in committee until I am authorized to do so. No action has been reported to the Senate. That is all I can say now.

I apprehend there will be no difficulty in the Senator obtaining individual knowledge from members of the committee. The customs of the Senate, its practices in regard to committee action, have been the result of long experience and of the rules written and unwritten of the body; and therefore it is that I cannot disclose to the honorable Senator everything that has taken place in the committee. As I am not authorized by the committee, I had rather not make a statement in regard to their action.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I have understood that the further consideration of the House bill to which I have referred has been postponed by the committee until December next, and if that be correct I desire to offer a resolution. Not having heard a denial from any gentleman of the committee, I will offer this resolution. I am very far from wishing any disrespect or making any criticism of the honorable gentlemen who compose that committee. No one on this floor regards them individually or collectively more highly than I do. I introduce the resolution, however, simply from a sense of duty, and I cannot allow my own personal feelings, that would prompt me to abstain from offering it, to prevent me discharging my public duty. I send the resolution to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] offers a resolution, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. No. 564) "to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and coin and bullion certificates, and for other purposes," is hereby discharged from further consideration of the same, and that said bill be considered before the Senate for action.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. WHYTE. I object to the consideration of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. COKE. I give notice that I shall endeavor to call up that resolution on Monday and secure action upon it.

Mr. HOUSTON. It comes up as a matter of course, I suppose.

RESOLUTION IN THE MORNING HOUR.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Texas proceeds, the routine business of the morning hour being through, the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] on the 27th of May in regard to the memorial of J. B. Greene, which was postponed until to-day, comes up.

Mr. VOORHEES. My colleague has not yet returned; I presume it had better go over informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to rise to the parliamentary inquiry whether if this resolution has been postponed it falls within the duty of the Chair to lay it before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was postponed specifically to this day. The Chair supposes that it is proper for him to lay it before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The order about taking up resolutions relates to those which have not been acted on or otherwise disposed of. I introduced a resolution early in the session about trying to attend to the business for which we came here and go home, but it did not seem to meet with much favor and it was laid on the table. That is, it was put out of the way. Now this resolution was taken up and by a vote of the Senate it was disposed of by postponing it. It therefore is on the calendar of resolutions for a particular time, like a bill that is postponed to a future day certain. I do not object to the Chair taking it up if he wants to do so; but as a mere matter of orderly practice, I think it stands exactly as a bill would or anything else that had been postponed to a future day certain. When the day certain comes, if it is a special order, of course the rule says it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the special order; but this is not a special order and there is the distinction. Of course I have not the least objection to its coming up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the first time this question has arisen and the rule is a little obscure. The Chair has given it no consideration; but the first impression of the Chair is that the point suggested by the Senator from Vermont is well taken, and the Chair will therefore refrain from laying the resolution before the Senate, and if the mover of it wishes it taken up he will have to move to take it up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I think is the correct practice.

SPECIAL POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the bill (S. No. 516) to extend the time of special postal service until service can be obtained by advertisement, with the House amendment thereto, and which amendment has been reported upon by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, be taken up in order to concur in the amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was in line 4, after the word "advertisement," to insert "not exceeding in any case one year."

Mr. MAXEY. The Senate passed this bill without dissent on the 5th of May, 1879. The bill went to the House and passed the House on the 4th of June, 1879, with the amendment, and that only which has just been read from the Secretary's desk, which is to add after the word "advertisement," in the sixth line of the printed bill and the fourth line of the engrossed bill, "not exceeding in any case one year." The amendment was submitted to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and they unanimously instructed me to ask that the Senate concur in it.

I will state that the amendment does not in the slightest degree better the bill or make the bill worse, because the law as it now stands requires the Postmaster-General to contract every six months, the result of which is that there are two advertisements during the year, one every six months. By prolonging the time to twelve months, as the law had been up to the 11th of August, 1876, the advertisements are now one year; and therefore when the bill as reported from the Senate committee is adopted it necessarily means that the contract cannot last longer than one year, and as the House amendment does not change it, I simply move that the Senate concur, as it is an important bill and it ought to become a law.

The amendment was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 572) to amend an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places of holding courts in said districts."

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives who are paid during the session only shall begin for this session; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills to change and correct the title of the bill (H. R. No. 1999) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1879, as passed by the two Houses of Congress at the present session so as to strike out the word "fourth," which occurs therein, and insert in lieu thereof the word "third."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

A bill (S. No. 491) in relation to the accounts of the United States entomological commission;

A bill (H. R. No. 1363) providing compensation to E. E. Rice for property transferred by him to the Government of the United States for the use of the diplomatic and consular representatives at Hakodadi, in Japan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1380) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District;

A bill (H. R. No. 2005) to confer upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia certain powers, duties, and limitations contained in chapter 8 (water service) of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth two volumes of Sailing Directions for the United States Hydrographic Office; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the international exhibitions to be held at Sydney and Melbourne, Australia, in 1879 and 1880.

JURORS IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour is at an end, and the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, which is the bill (S. No. 375) to repeal sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the question being on the passage of the bill. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I feel more indisposed physically than I do spiritually in respect to this particular measure, and therefore I shall content myself with some very brief observations upon it.

Lest I should forget it I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] said yesterday about the supposed opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States as to the constitutionality of section 821 of the Revised Statutes. His language was this:

> These laws have by eminent judicial authority not simply been declared to be invalid because they compelled a man to testify to his own guilt, but they have been forcibly and truly declared to be as invalid and unconstitutional, to use the language of Mr. Justice Field in a late case, as it would be to quarter troops in the dwelling-house of a citizen in time of peace.

Mr. President, I have read with some care all the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I have them here, upon the subject to which the Senator from Delaware thus speaks; and I am unable to find a single syllable in any one of those decisions that supports the declaration of the honorable Senator from Delaware as applied to section 821. A single dissenting justice declared it to be his opinion that this provision was unconstitutional, and upon this somewhat novel legal ground—and I wish the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] would give me his attention as he has been a judge of the Supreme Court, and we all respect his judgment and knowledge of the law,—Mr. Justice Field places his opinion of the unconstitutionality of section 821, which authorizes the judge to administer a certain oath and to set the juror aside if he does not take it, on his declaration that inasmuch as making war against the United States is defined by a hateful and obnoxious section to be treason and punishable with death, the court has no business to ascertain whether the juror is qualified or disqualified without a trial by jury on an indictment; and therefore although a law is perfectly constitutional that disqualifies any person from being a juror who has participated in particular insurrections, or violation of a liquor law, or made war against the United States, or defrauded the revenue, you can never set him aside as a juryman until you have first empaneled some body to try him in the regular way upon an indictment and convicted him, and sentenced him. It is his belief that then you have the only proof that a court can take of the fact that he is a disqualified person. I believe I have stated the position of Judge Field correctly.

Mr. President, if there is any man in the Senate Chamber who believes such a proposition as that to be law, I will most gladly sit down and have him get up and say so. Of course nobody will say it. The learned judge, in the great pressure of his duties for whom I have a high respect—and he is a learned judge—made a slip of the tongue and an obiter dictum. That is all there is about it.

Now, Mr. President, I have to do with the statement of my honorable friend from Delaware a little further. I wish that he were here to hear me; or, better, I wish he were here to point out in these decisions that I hold in my hand, where it is that the Supreme Court have said anything tending to show that section 821 is unconstitutional. On the contrary the substance of their decisions is that it is perfectly constitutional and within the proper competence of Congress in fixing the qualifications of jurors. All they say is that no man is bound to criminate himself, and when any man is called as a juror and sworn upon his voir dire to ascertain whether he is qualified or not, as whether he is an alien, or a freeholder where that is a qualification, and so forth; and if acts of criminality are a discrimination to ask as to them, after you have gone through with the alienage and the freehold and so forth when you come to ask him if he has stolen a sheep or has levied war against the United States, he is not bound to answer. That is all; the court must find out in some other way whether he is qualified or disqualified as a juror.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) There is too much disorder on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know how unpleasant it is for Senators to listen to an able speech on one day and then to be compelled the next day to listen (or go out) to a feeble attempt to point out some of the more glaring of the errors that exist in that speech. It is only the pleasant words that we like to hear, and that is natural to us all.

I believe, Mr. President, there is a Latin proverb—if I am wrong my learned friend, the chairman of the Committee on the Library, will correct me—Ridentem dicere verum, quid vetat? But when it comes to speaking the other kind of truth, it is not so very agreeable. We may thus dismiss, Mr. President, I think all profession that there is any judicial authority for saying that section 821 of the Revised Statutes is obnoxious to constitutional objection, and I am surprised that the honorable Senator from Delaware, who probably spoke rapidly and without previous preparation or thought on that point, should have fallen into the error of misunderstanding the effect of these decisions.

As to section 820 it is quite unnecessary to spend a moment of time as to whether it is constitutional or unconstitutional for the reason that one republican Congress has repealed it altogether and another republican Senate has repealed it once, but it could not persuade a democratic House of Representatives to agree to its repeal.

Mr. President, when we adjourned yesterday, I believe I was on the question of what was the real purpose and object of this provision, which suddenly came out of the darkness into the light, as it respects the composition of juries on the question of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and I believe the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] was somewhat condemnatory of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and myself because we had undertaken to intrude upon the domain of the Senator from Florida, and others of that ilk, in an effort at the guardianship—I believe that was the word—of the colored people of the South.

Mr. CALL. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. CALL. What I objected to was not the proper interest gentlemen might have, but the spirit of fault-finding that, in the contemplation of Senators on this side, it was evident implied a charge that they were guilty of a purpose to deprive the colored people of the right of sitting upon juries. That was the imputation from the remarks of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York, that the purpose of Senators representing here the States in which there were colored people was to deprive them of the right of sitting upon juries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, there is a presumption of law that every man (and I suppose it includes every Senator) intends the consequences of his own acts; and when, therefore, I see the Senator from Florida and others who have always been known in the history of this country as the special, and for a long time the legal, guardians of the colored man vote for a measure which does in the clearest manner overthrow present existing rights of colored men, then I have a right to presume that he intends that consequence of the act that he does with his eyes wide open.

But now let us see what it was that the Senator from Florida really did condemn us for yesterday:

> Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I desire before the vote is taken to say a single word. I propose to vote against this amendment, and I shall do it because it is entirely unnecessary. I wish to say that there is no need for Senators who have no colored people in their States to assume guardianship over them. I affirm that I have as much if not more regard for the rights of the colored man than the Senator from New York, or the Senator from Vermont, or any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber. A large portion of the people of my State are colored people. The Constitution and the laws protect them in sitting upon the juries of the country. This amendment is without effect in that respect, and does not protect nor secure the colored people in those rights. They are protected under section 800 of the Revised Statutes, and our laws, which require the selection of the juries to be made because of their intelligence and without discrimination, amply protect them.

Mr. President, I think I did not misunderstand until this explanation of the Senator from Florida the fair meaning of what he stated yesterday; and that was that he wished to warn off the Senator from New York and the Senator from Vermont from being allowed to take any interest in this Chamber, or elsewhere I suppose, in that portion of the citizens of the United States who theoretically are concerned in the welfare and prosperity of this Government and in whose welfare and prosperity reciprocally the Government and all the other people of the United States are concerned.

Mr. President, I must be excused from being warned off. My notion of this Government is that the Senator from Florida in respect of the protection of national rights is just as much the representative of the people of the State of Vermont as I am, and that if he believes any change in the law or the resistance to any change in the law will affect their welfare in the character that I have referred to, it is not only his right but his duty to say so and give his reasons for that opinion. I hope he will not think me intrusive, therefore, if I sometimes speak, according to my humble power, for that portion of the people of the United States whose skins are not precisely the color of those of my honorable friend and myself.

But, Mr. President, let us come down now a little more particularly. I should like to ask my honorable friend from Florida if he is quite sure that the constitution of Florida—I am not speaking of its laws—guarantees the right to sit upon juries irrespective of color.

Mr. CALL. We have always so construed and so enforced it in the courts and by the Legislature of the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has that question arisen in the courts?

Mr. CALL. It has practically, for every day we draw colored jurors; there is no discrimination.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will send for the constitution of Florida, and while I go on I will send it over to my honorable friend, and he can perhaps refer me to the clause; but in a hasty perusal of it this morning my eye did not happen to fall upon the particular clause named, though I dare say it is there.

Mr. CALL. The Senator will allow me to say that the constitution of the State of Florida is the constitution adopted under the reconstruction acts by the republican party, and we have always regarded it as in full conformity with the constitutional amendments; and it is the constant practice and has always been of the courts of Florida under that constitution to impanel colored jurors, and without any discrimination in regard to race or color.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not spoken of what the practice in the State of Florida is, nor what are the acts of its Legislature as to the forming of juries. I have no doubt the honorable Senator is perfectly correct when he says that according to the existing acts of the Legislature of Florida colored men are not, by force of law, excluded from juries, nor as a fact I presume, though I do not know how that is. But as I always listen with attention to what the honorable Senator from Florida says, and I have had occasion to observe his accuracy of statement, my eye fell upon this distinct clause in his remarks that the constitution of Florida and its law protected its colored citizens in sitting upon juries in Florida. Supposing that he meant that there was a provision of that kind in the constitution of Florida per se, I looked at it, and, as I say, in a hasty perusal I did not happen to see it. I do not now mean to intimate that it is not there. I only say that I looked to see it. I dare say it is there. I find just such a provision in the constitution of the State of Texas under the reconstruction laws or at any rate after the war was over and under republican auspices; but when under democratic auspices the constitution of the State of Texas was changed, that provision of security was stricken out, according to the best of my belief. I may be in error about that, but I will take the hazard of stating it as what I understand to be a fact until somebody shall show that my reading of that new constitution has likewise overlooked the clause that was in the old one securing this right to sit on juries.

There is another thing, Mr. President. This bill in emphatic and specific terms declares, as I stated yesterday, that the test of the qualification of a juror shall be the law of a State in which the district happens to be where the United States court is held, and the law of the State at the time the jury is to be impaneled. Therefore if by the law of Vermont to-day—and the same might be said of its constitution because Vermont can change her constitution—colored men and white men are equally entitled to sit upon juries so far as that circumstance affects it, the next session of the Legislature of the State of Vermont may reverse that policy and declare that white men shall not sit on juries, that the statute shall read that all male taxable colored inhabitants and citizens of the State of Vermont shall be liable to do jury duty and be entitled to sit on juries; then the law of the United States would have said that no white man in the State of Vermont shall sit on any jury to administer the laws of the United States.

Is there anybody who hears me that would like to say that? I am now speaking of the principle and of the terms of this enactment that you propose to make, and I say it ties you up with an iron hand and declares that whatever discriminations in respect of race or color now exist in any of the States, or whatever, at the pleasure of any one or all of the States may hereafter be made, shall be the law of this nation for the selection of jurors for the administration of its justice. If anybody wants to go for that, he can; I do not.

It was said yesterday by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and I refer to what he said with great deference and diffidence because I do not know but that I shall be admonished that I ought to have said it before, although this is the first chance I had, as it was on the other occasion—it was said yesterday by the honorable Senator from Ohio if I correctly understood him that the amendment of the Senator from New York, when he had gotten over the great constitutional obstacle of State rights so called, was wholly unnecessary, because by the laws of all the States discrimination on account of color or race was forbidden, or at any rate did not exist. And the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] who came and went like a beam of light in and out of the Chamber during the debate, illuminated it also with the statement that if it could be shown that there was any need for such a provision, if it was not the law of all the States now, then it was a necessary and wholesome and proper provision that ought to be adopted because his very soul revolted at the notion that the color of your skin or the texture of your hair or the long line of your ancestry coming from this or that sun of the Orient was to be the test in this fair and equally politically divided jury that now for the first time under the sun is to be set up.

Mr. President, I have not had much time about this business and I tried to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary to find out something about it; but I could not succeed in that, and I went for the nearest and one of the most respectable States of this Union—there was not time to go far of course and I had to take the nearest State, Maryland. I find that by one of those singular instances that will sometimes happen to a man who is hunting for a sled-crook in a large forest I struck the right tree the very first time; and here is the crook for the benefit of the honorable Senators from Ohio and Georgia and all the others who have such a hungry longing to rectify all the wrongs of the black man in the courts of the United States. Here is the act of the State of Maryland of the year of our Lord 1870. I believe it has not been changed. If it has, the State of Maryland has kept the act changing it where the democratic party keep their schemes,—in a caucus somewhere. They did not put it in the statute-book. This is the way it reads:

It shall be the duty of the clerk of the county commissioners for each of the counties of this State to make out and file with the clerks of the circuit courts for said counties, not less than twenty days before the beginning of the first regular term of said courts next ensuing the passage of this act, and not less than twenty days before the beginning of the second regular term of said courts after each and every general election held thereafter, a fair and complete list of the white male taxable inhabitants or residents of said county, whose names appear on the tax-books of said county, and who are not known to said clerks to be under the age of twenty-five years, and to which said lists so to be made and filed the said clerks respectively shall append a certificate that said list is fully and fairly made; and for making such list the said clerk shall receive such compensation as the county commissioners shall deem right and proper.

This is on the subject of selecting, drawing, and summoning jurors in the counties. There is a distinct and express provision that no man in the State of Maryland except a white man shall sit on a jury. The honorable Senator who sits in the chair at this moment [Mr. WHYTE] says it is a mistake. I should be glad to have him point out how, when he gets a good opportunity, and I would wait to hear him point it out now. That is the way it reads, and I have searched the statutes since 1870—perhaps I have missed it—for the repealing or changing statute. If I have missed the changing or repealing statute, nothing will give me greater pleasure than to make the correction because I shall rejoice that the State of Maryland has rectified what I consider to be a wrong. If it flows from any subsequent change in the statutes, I will send for them and have it pointed out.

I will come to the succeeding provision about how you are to get these white men into the jury-box, in a minute, so as to show the connection; but before I show the connection I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Florida and so on to their remarks yesterday about the monstrous provision in the amendment of the Senator from New York and the one I offered also, about affixing a penalty for the failure to obey the provisions of the law touching the qualification and impaneling of jurors that they thought was perfectly horrible, and if for no other reason than that, that would be enough to condemn it in the eyes of all patriotic citizens. And yet here in this statute of the enlightened State of Maryland there is this provision in respect to putting in white male taxable inhabitants:

And for failure to perform the duty hereby imposed—

And that is to put in white men and leave out the black ones—

the said clerk to said commissioners shall forfeit and pay a fine to the State of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, in the discretion of the court, to be recovered by indictment, &c.

The amendment of the Senator from New York did not have a minimum, it only had a maximum, but the State of Maryland has thought it fit, and wisely enough, to impose a penalty. If she is to have any laws for the performance of duties she must impose sanctions to provide what the honorable Senators yesterday characterized in the amendment of the Senator from New York as being a simple monstrosity, I suppose equally infamous as was the law itself in 1862 in the opinion of the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] who so greatly regrets the want of tender feeling on the part of some portion of the citizens of the United States, as he looks at it, toward some part of the people in another portion of the United States, while in the same breath he describes the acts of the people whose want of kindness he regrets as having been for the last sixteen years simply infamous. It is not a good way, I am afraid, to encourage a gushing good-will, but still that is a question of taste. I do not propose to go into that.

Now I come to the rest of this Maryland act to show the Senate, so far as I am capable of comprehending it, what is to be done next:

It shall be the duty of the judges of the circuit courts for each of the counties, not less than fifteen days before the commencement of each term of the court at which jurors are required to attend, in the presence of such practicing members of the bar of said court as shall think proper to attend, notice of the time and place having been first given to said bar through the criers of said courts to proceed to select from the lists last finished by the clerks of the county commissioners provided for in the 1st section of this act—

"Supra section 19 in this codification," says the note—and from the poll-books of the several election districts of said counties, that shall be returned and filed in the clerk's office of said courts after any general election that may be held previously to such election, a panel to consist of the names of two hundred persons in the several counties of Baltimore, &c.

Going on with the details. My honorable friend from Maryland who now occupies the chair asks me if this does not allow a black man to be selected. I say no. The first section declares in explicit terms how the list shall be made up. It shall be made up of the white male taxable inhabitants or residents of the county whose names appear on the tax-books. Then the next section provides that the judges from that list and from the poll-book shall make up a jury. Do I understand the honorable Senator from Maryland to mean that the judge has two independent sources to draw from?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One the tax-book and the other the poll-book.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then if I understand the law of Maryland—I am getting light—a white male taxable inhabitant only can sit upon a jury, while a black inhabitant who is not taxable may! Then the law of Maryland makes an unjust discrimination in favor of the colored man against the white man! You say a white man shall not be a juryman unless he pays taxes, but the black man shall be a juryman if he will only vote. Is that it?

Mr. THURMAN. I want to make a suggestion if the Senator will receive it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, I receive everything, even an admonition from my honorable friend, with due humility.

Mr. THURMAN. I interpose simply to save time. While I do not at all concur with the reasoning of the Senator from Vermont, and still adhere to the opinion I entertained yesterday, that there is no necessity for any amendment of this bill in order to accomplish what he desires, still I have been admonished by past experience that very ingenious and subtle arguments are used in some quarters of this Government to have the effect to defeat legislation, and I do not want anything of that kind on this bill. A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading was voted down. The bill, therefore, is not now open to amendment; but by unanimous consent that vote by which the motion to reconsider was defeated can be itself set aside and the vote ordering the third reading of the bill can be reconsidered, and then the bill will be open to amendment. I suggest that that be done; that by unanimous consent we set aside all the proceedings, including the vote ordering the third reading of the bill, so as to leave the bill open to amendment; and I think we can very easily arrive at a conclusion which will be satisfactory to all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield for that purpose?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will tell you in a minute what I will do.

Mr. President, provoked yesterday to refer to proceedings in the Committee on the Judiciary by a bad example of my honorable and learned chairman, I complained, and justly as I thought, that the minority in that committee had not had a fair chance to have the bearings of this measure considered and to know where the grievances were that it was supposed needed redressing; in other words, to explore and exhaust the subject as a committee ought to do; and I besought this Senate to let the matter go back to the committee for a reconsideration and a full consideration; but it was refused. If my honorable friend from Ohio is willing that this bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary for full and fair consideration, I shall most gladly assent to it.

Mr. THURMAN. The bill having been read a third time, it is a question then whether it can be amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not seem to get any response to that.

Mr. THURMAN. I say it will be a question then, the bill having been read the third time here, if it were sent back by a recommittal, whether the committee can amend it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not mean to leave it open to any doubt about that. I am willing to agree that the vote ordering the third reading of the bill may be reconsidered and the bill recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary for full investigation.

Mr. THURMAN. Why not agree to its reconsideration and see whether we cannot amend it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not agree to this? That is what I have been beseeching for all the time, and have been refused. I besought this Senate to reconsider the vote, and the Senate would not do that. And now the honorable chairman of the committee is unwilling to reconsider the bill himself in a committee where we can carefully and prayerfully and fairly explore this whole subject.

Now, Mr. President, I should like to know, inasmuch as it does not appear that we can agree to have the bill recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, what amendment it is that the Senator from Ohio is anxious to make. If he will only put it in writing and let me see it as I go on, (because I have several other things to say,) I will then tell him whether I will go for a reconsideration in order that he may offer it. I cannot tell what the amendment may be. As the Senator from New York suggests, and judging from our previous experience, it might be likely to be one that would make the bill worse than it is now.

I want to say one or two more words, I shall not be able to say much more, about section 821; and in reference to the observation of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] who so ably addressed us yesterday, of a grievance and misuse under it at some court in Charleston, if I correctly understood the place where, as I understood him, he said that under section 821—I do not know that he said that, but that is what I supposed he meant; the Senator shakes his head; he did not allude to section 821——

Mr. HAMPTON. I stated that at the recent United States court in Charleston under these test oaths the illustration I gave occurred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Which test oath, that in section 821?

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not recollect the number of the section containing it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the number if it is the one under which the court exercises a discretion. I should like to know if the Senator from South Carolina speaks of his own observation or only upon information.

Mr. HAMPTON. I speak from information. I was not present at the court, but I speak from information derived from parties who were present. I know the fact which I stated, that one of the judges was disqualified under that test oath. I stated the fact that the district attorney was disqualified, that the assistant district attorney was disqualified, and I know the fact that republican jurors who had served during the war, one of them in my own command, were allowed to go on the panel without taking the oath, and every man who was considered to be a democrat had the oath applied to him, and some who had grown up since the war were peremptorily challenged and made to stand aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what the Senator means when he says he knows it?

Mr. HAMPTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He believes it on evidence that he supposes to be perfectly reliable. Now, if the Senator would kindly tell me when it was that this event occurred, and who was the judge, and who was the district attorney and who the assistant district attorney, and what was the trial, I should like to know all that. I have not the same means of knowledge that my honorable friend from South Carolina has, because I have not obtained that capacity for absolute knowledge that he seems to have done of knowing that a thing took place when he was not there; but I suppose, to leave off joking about it, that the Senator really means that he has information that he relies upon.

Mr. HAMPTON. Perfectly. It was at the recent trials in Charleston, I think last month, Judge Bryan was the district judge, Mr. Northrup was the district attorney, and the assistant attorney was Mr. Maxwell.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was Judge Bryan the judge to whom the Senator referred?

Mr. HAMPTON. Judge Bryan and Judge Bond were the two judges.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That the honorable Senator from South Carolina says is a grievance. Now, I think before we pass upon that question, we ought to know precisely the circumstances of that transaction. In the first place we ought to see somebody, through a committee of this Senate, who was then and there present, and ascertain fully all the truth connected with that transaction.

Mr. HAMPTON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him a moment, I can state for his information and the information of the Senate, that my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] was present, and from him I got the facts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator not to suppose that I am doubting in the slightest degree the accuracy of the information that he has received as he states it; and I should not doubt what the Senator's colleague says that he saw himself; but I should be glad, in order that we might judge accurately of how this thing took place, what the situation was, and whether it was right or wrong, to see it in all its light, to have a committee that could look into the matter and not only take the statement but put inquiries to Senator BUTLER as to all that he saw and all that he knew and its connection with events, and also to bring before the committee the judges and the district attorney and the jurymen, and know exactly how and why and what occurred.

Mr. President, it was not many years ago that in the State of South Carolina there were certain trials called, I believe, the ku-klux trials, trials, I believe, where a great number of the persons brought to trial, after judicial forms had been gone through with, confessed their guilt of what I perhaps am not offensive in stating have been considered horrible atrocities; and I have heard it said, though I never heard either of them say it myself, that Mr. Reverdy Johnson and Mr. Stanbery, who were down there assisting in the defense, spoke with great emphasis of the wickedness of the transactions that were disclosed. I think it was current information at the time,—I do not know that it was true,—that a large number of the people of South Carolina contributed funds to defend those accused ku-klux people. Now, if in such a case as I have supposed—I do not know that it is true, but it will answer for an illustration—if those who had contributed funds for the defense of the persons guilty of such atrocities as it turned out, were drawn upon the jury, and it turned out that those atrocities grew out of political considerations connected with the rebellion, then I say it would not do in my humble judgment a grievance or an unjust thing that that jury should be sifted on the basis of ascertaining whether they had an unconquerable bias in favor of discharging those prisoners and finding them not guilty no matter what they had done.

Mr. HAMPTON. May I ask the Senator from Vermont to permit me one word on that point?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will yield, owing to the infirmity of my friend who is not well, though I have not finished on the point.

Mr. HAMPTON. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I interpose as much for his sake as for my own; and I avail myself of this opportunity which his courtesy has extended to me to say a word about those ku-klux trials.

Some years ago the Senator from Vermont, who occupied then the same position that he does now, charged upon the floor of this Chamber that he had information that I was connected with the ku-klux organization in South Carolina, and with me he associated my present colleague [Mr. BUTLER] and a very distinguished gentleman who is now a judge in that State. We wrote a respectful letter to the Senate, and came on to Washington, asking the most earnest and rigid scrutiny. That letter was presented here, but the Senate took no action. The Senator from Vermont when that letter was presented said that he had been informed that the Government had information to that effect. We asked that, if there was any such information, it might be brought forward; but that never was done. And I take the opportunity of saying now—and I hope the Senator from Vermont will do me the justice to know that I speak with perfect sincerity—that if there was one man in America who had no knowledge of, no connection with, no sympathy with anything like the ku-klux organization, it was myself. I did not know that there was any such organization in South Carolina until those trials occurred. I could give the explanation, but I will not detain the Senate, of how those organizations, as I found out afterward, were inaugurated and what they were intended for, and how they were perverted afterward, as I admit, into doing wrong; but I only wish to say that the gentlemen who were named here, I feel sure, had no knowledge of them, no connection with them. For myself I state that with absolute certainty.

The contribution that was made by the people of South Carolina to defend those men was simply a contribution that was made on the presumption the law always makes that parties are innocent until they are proved guilty.

I simply rose to make this explanation, because I did not believe that the Senator would then, or that he would now, willingly do me injustice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from South Carolina is quite right as to his personal reference to me. The observation that I made in the Senate some years ago, although it has entirely escaped my recollection—his statement now recalls it to my mind—was stated to be upon information, and except as a conspicuous general in the confederacy during the late war the Senator from South Carolina was entirely unknown to me unless by reputation; and therefore I only spoke of him as I would of any general factor in the politics of the affair. The information of course I did have. I am delighted to know now, as I was then on the written disclaimer of the Senator from South Carolina who I think wrote a letter as he states, that this information in the possession of the Government was entirely unfounded, coming from somebody who either had it second-hand from somebody who invented it or suspected it, or manufactured it out of the whole cloth. I am very glad to know it. It was probably quite unnecessary for the Senator to repeat the denial that I believe was so full in the letter. Nobody I think has ever believed the allegation since. So the Senator is quite right in supposing that I would be very far from wishing to do him the slightest injustice.

Now we come back to the point, Mr. President, we are on,—the point as to what is the fit means in some cases of purging a jury from those who are organized by politics or clanism or leagues, or by whatever name you call it, in support of a cause, be it a great one or a small one, which violates the law, from being allowed to hang a jury, a single one of them to hang a jury as the expression in the West is, and thereby prevent the person who has been guilty of the crime from being hung himself.

Mr. THURMAN. Now if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I will not give way now.

The state of the law, then, simply is that it is within the competence of a court of the United States in some cases, that is it is proper for it, to exclude from service on the jury a person who in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States has been guilty of treason or insurrection against its laws. That the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and a majority of the Senate, judging from their votes upon this bill, say is an obnoxious law, and the Senator from South Carolina went so far as to say that it was an infamous law. I am unable to see that it is.

Suppose you are to have a new rebellion—this does not refer to the old rebellion, does not refer to any particular rebellion—suppose you are to have a new rebellion, then Senators on the other side I suppose will be eager, when it is too late, to re-enact this same statute again. But inasmuch as you cannot tinker with criminal laws very handily after the event has happened to make it work well, there might be difficulty about that. The Senator from Ohio said that this was to exclude from the jury, in the discretion of the judge, anybody who had so much as given a cup of cold water—as if any such drink as that was known in Ohio—[laughter]—a cup of cold water to a suffering and it may be a penitent rebel.

Mr. President, I have too much respect for the Senator from Ohio to regard that flight of his as anything more than an ornament to discourse. He could not have meant to tell this Senate that the provision in section 821 touches any kindness that is done to a man engaged in rebellion or insurrection as kindness, as humanity, as a fellow-feeling for a brother man in misfortune or in crime. The true construction of that statute, in my humble judgment,—and I believe my friend will agree with me on reflection—is that the kind of assistance which the judge is authorized to take as evidence of vice is accessary assistance, just as under that famous democratic law called the fugitive slave law where a man was punished for harboring a runaway slave—I believe I have that word "harboring" right—there were other words in; I have not studied the fugitive slave law much lately, though I presume I shall have to look it over again in a few years if things go on as they are—somebody, in Pennsylvania I think, did give a cup of cold water to a man who was traveling by the underground railroad from the State of Maryland to Her Majesty's provinces, but the courts had no difficulty in saying that in order to convict a man under that statute, even in democratic times, it would be necessary to make out that this assistance of whatever character it was that was given to the fugitive must have been assistance intended to aid him in the object he had in view, and that was to get away from his master. And so here the assistance that makes a man obnoxious to the judgment of the judge is the assistance that shows that he was predetermined to let the man off and aided him with the purpose of promoting the design he had in view in his character as an enemy of the United States.

Is there anybody who says that juries ought to be made up of enemies of the United States? I take it not. The argument is—and it is a good one—that he who was once an enemy of the United States may now be its friend. True; gladly say I, true. I know many such; and I see many such now; and when such men come to the jury-box this statute only applies to them exactly what the common law in analogous cases applies in the discretion of the judge upon other topics that tend to show favor or bias in respect to the particular transaction to be considered. It is therefore the merest moonshine to undertake to convince any intelligent body of men in this country that section 821 is either infamous in the somewhat exaggerated language, I presume he would consider it himself by and by, of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, or vicious upon sound principles of judicial legislation applied to any of the affairs of mankind.

Mr. President, I wish I could state what inquiries were made in the Judiciary Committee about this matter, but I cannot; the rules do not allow it——

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know. The chairman of the committee has stated pretty much everything that has happened in the committee. Why cannot we?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I will not break over.

Mr. THURMAN. I am perfectly willing that everything shall be stated. I have violated no rule yet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither have I. I have only followed in the footsteps of my illustrious predecessor. I do not know that he has violated any rule; I do not say that he has; and I certainly will not.

But I wish the Judiciary Committee might have investigated this South Carolina instance, the first instance of a grievance under section 821 that I ever heard of, and as one member of the Judiciary Committee and as one Senator I have been industrious in making inquiries upon this subject ever since the question of the repeal of this section was mooted.

Why, Mr. President, the States where these laws would have their chief application—although judging from some of your disability bills they would have application in many of the Northern States, for there are some there who are in that category—the places where these laws would have their chief application cannot contain, in respect of proportions of persons otherwise liable to jury duty, 10 per cent. of people who could be brought into the discretionary judgment under that section. From 1865 to now there have been fourteen years. There was probably a considerable number of the populations of those States that did not engage in warfare against the United States. There is a very large number that certainly did not. They were bound to their plantations by ties of a stronger character, since happily unloosed. And in all the inquiries I have been able to make, the first instance of which I have heard of what is called an improper application of this law is the one stated by the Senator from South Carolina; and before I determine whether that is an instance either to show that the law is so liable to abuse that it ought to be repealed or that it has been abused, I should want to carefully explore the whole transaction; I should want to know who made up the whole body of the panel who were summoned to attend that court; I should want to know what person was on trial; I should want to know what he was accused of; I should want to know what was the settled opinion of every democrat who had not accepted the situation in the fullest sense of the term, and was excluded from the jury as to the constitutional validity of a single one of the laws of the United States under which election trials were going on. I understand those were cases of trial for fraud in the late election. I have heard men as distinguished even as Senators of the United States assert not long ago that every line and every syllable of these election laws punishing frauds at congressional elections was unconstitutional.

I say that anybody, be he democrat or republican, have he been rebel or have he been patriot during the late rebellion, who comes into court and says "this election which has now been held so far as it has been made obnoxious to any law of the United States is free and clear of it; that is our democratic doctrine; it is our old State-rights doctrine; and I will go in for old associations and old rights and old principles to say that this whole thing is outside of the jurisdiction of this court and I will not convict"—should be excluded. If there was such a state of opinion and feeling as that, then I say the man who thought so and could be excluded on the ground section 821 provides for as being really the source out of which all the consequent train of his deductions flows, ought to have it applied to him if you want an impartial trial.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not now. And you do not make it less impartial by having on your jury men all of whom believe the law to be constitutional. That is the statement that the Senator was about to make, I imagine, because it is the natural one. It has been made so often that I am sure he could not have thought I should have forgotten it.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I was going to say this, that the Senator proposes to put another qualification, not simply to inquire whether a man had given aid and comfort to the rebellion, but what are the man's opinions on a question of law, which is another addition he proposes to make to the statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, I have not proposed anything of the kind. The Senator was thinking about the caucus or something at that time, I am afraid, and he did not pay attention to what I said.

As the Senator from New York reminds me, this sort of inquiry is no new doctrine as applied to certain states of events. When people were tried under the fugitive-slave law under the authority of the Government of the United States, the jury were carefully polled in many instances (and I do not know but all) to know whether they believed that law to be constitutional. If they did not, away they went, "challenged propter affectum," if I quote the Ohio phrase correctly. Oh, no, Mr. President, in the language of an eminent statesman "that won't do." It won't do; it is too thin. That is one trouble with it. As long as society is organized and must go on you have got to assume for the purpose of trying causes under the laws that the men who are to administer those laws believe in them, believe they have a right to administer them.

If you have a judge it is his duty to determine whether a law is constitutional or not. If you have a jury, usually it is their duty to determine whether certain facts have taken place; in some States I know they have the right to determine the law, and therefore presumably you must always have a jury who are willing to convict if they believe the party to be guilty of the offense charged, and if they do not believe so they are not proper men to try the case fairly; and it is no answer to say that you get an equal want of impartiality on the other side, because so far as that is a want of impartiality it is an infirmity in government itself. But because a man believes a law to be constitutional and believes it ought to be enforced, it does not follow that he believes a particular person charged with breaking it has broken it.

The man, therefore, who is a republican, who was a rebel, and who has committed that last and worst of all offenses, as it seems to be thought by democrats, of really accepting the situation and asserting his manhood's right to believe in republican principles if he does—even such a man on a jury believing that the laws are constitutional and that the war is over in consequence as well as in fact so far as its reactionary tendency is concerned, sitting on that jury and having that belief, is perfectly impartial to try whether A B has broken it or not. But if you reverse the case, then it is of no consequence to the juryman whether A B has broken it or whether he has not; in either case he is bound to acquit him, because he says he has not broken any law; if he did it, he did just right so far as the law goes, and if he did not do it the law is unconstitutional; I do not care whether he did it or not. That is what section 821 authorizes the court to determine.

As I was saying, Mr. President, this section 821 is a continuing statute, it refers to future rebellions and insurrections, and if the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and those who agree with him have any doubt as to what I am now about to lay down let them look into the foot-notes of Brightly's Digest at the beginning of the title "Crimes," and they will see a long series of decisions, the correctness of which in point of law I have never heard questioned, going to show that any organized, preconcerted, forcible, armed attempt to overthrow the due execution of the laws of the United States is levying war against the United States or an insurrection against the United States—one or the other; I will not waste the time by going into distinctions between the two; it is not necessary to do so.

Therefore, Mr. President, you will see that this provision authorizing a juror to be inquired of twenty years hence whether he has been engaged in any rebellion or insurrection against the laws of the United States is not as sensitive people or those who think they are sensitive or those who wish somebody to think they think they are sensitive seem to suppose, looking back to that unhappy misfortune of 1861–'65. We are all glad to forget it as far as we can. There are some things about it that cannot be forgotten, because they live like the constitutional amendments and the laws made to enforce them. There are some things about it that cannot be forgotten, because they live like the monuments that States and cities have built to heroic valor and patriotism. There are many other things that must live in this new order of things. But in all the senses in which I am sure the Senators on the other side will understand me as meaning, we are glad that it is gone by and shall be equally rejoiced to forget it if you would only let us forget it, but you seem determined that you will not. It is the future, therefore, that is to be considered; and wherever a combination like the whisky insurrection of 1793 or 1795 in Pennsylvania, or that of the Shays in Massachusetts, the paper-money insurrection, occurs, then when somebody who has violated the peace and the happiness of his fellow-citizens and the law comes to be tried and a jury is impaneled, there will stand your statute that authorizes the judge upon proper application to ascertain whether any one in that jury is in complicity with that great concerted attempt for which the accused is on trial; and yet the honorable Senator from Ohio and the rest of the Senators over there seem to think that a law of that kind is totally untenable and atrocious. I am unable to understand it.

But I must dismiss that, Mr. President, with a single observation. It has been said that the judge on the bench is not under this disability, that he may try the cause while the juryman who was the fellow-soldier with the judge in the confederacy is set aside, and that that is unequal and unjust. By no means. The laws of the United States and the Constitution of the United States declare that that judge should not sit on the bench until the solemn judgment of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress trying his merits should have decided that he might; and all this statute declares is that the juror shall not go into the box until a judicial investigation in connection with the same events shall have determined whether he ought to be permitted. That is all. Senators are entirely mistaken, therefore, in supposing that here is an invidious discrimination, that you are applying a test to an honorable gentleman who comes to the jury—as I see many here by whom I should be quite willing to have my life and honor tried—that such men are subjected to an invidious test by the very judge who stands in the same category. No, sir; by no manner of means. They were both subjected to tests. The test has been applied to the judge and he has been admitted to his seat, and the law applies the test to the juryman. If he stands it, the judge allows him to take his seat. If he does not stand it, it is his duty to set him aside.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator feel that he is correct in that statement?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perfectly so.

Mr. THURMAN. Will he allow me to call his attention——

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the greatest possible pleasure.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Vermont seems to think the only difference between the judge and the juryman is that the man who is judge has been exonerated by the vote of two-thirds of the members of Congress, and therefore that he may be considered a whitewashed man and perfectly proper to sit. Now I call his attention to the fact——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not speak of anybody as whitewashed.

Mr. THURMAN. That was my own description. He is purged of all his sins, he is all right. Now, is the juryman not in the same category with the judge? The disqualification of the fourteenth amendment, which it requires a vote of two-thirds to remove, only applies to persons "who, having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof"—no such person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, until his disabilities are removed. But suppose a man is nominated for judge who never did take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, whose case therefore never came under the fourteenth amendment——

Mr. BLAINE. Have there been such appointments?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not care whether there have or not. There may be.

Mr. BLAINE. Not in this generation.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Maine——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot have my speech printed at the expense of these two gentlemen. I am willing to hear my friend from Ohio, but not both.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator hear me?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I do.

Mr. THURMAN. Take a judge who never was an officer before, who never had taken any oath and therefore never came under the fourteenth amendment at all; yet that man may have given aid and comfort, according to this section 821, and cannot be a juror, and yet he may be a judge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, I believe I was about as familiar with that before as I was with the statutes of Maryland at least. It is perfectly familiar to me. The Senator misunderstands my point. He takes the whole for a part. That is the error into which he has fallen. There is a difference in respect of a certain part of this class of cases, and what is that difference? It is simply a difference of degree; that is all. When the people of the United States or that unconstitutional portion of them that was then called the United States—to borrow the democratic way of putting it—succeeded in putting down the rebellion, they chose in a certain way to forgive, so far as political disabilities went, a certain part of the people of the United States who had been in the rebellion, without any further action; and so far as political disabilities went, as to another portion of that people that had been in the insurrection or rebellion, they did not choose to forgive them until there should be a further test applied.

When the honorable Senator, mixing things in that way, comes and says that it is still invidious, he had better think again. When he can make out that the office of juryman—to misname it by calling it an office at all—that the employment of jurymen is the exertion of a political faculty, the government of the country, and therefore falling within the theory of some judge being put in one category and some in another, then he will have got the first skirmish-line out, it may be, for showing that the remark I made did not cover the whole case. That he cannot make out. No, Mr. President, I repeat that this whole thing—if it was anywhere else I should call it gammon, here it is not gammon of course, it is statesmanship—is a delusion; I have a right to say that with respect to everybody, and great respect as I certainly feel. It is a delusion that some stress from some quarter that the general public are not permitted to see but only to guess at existing, leads these gentlemen to be so eager by self-created sophisms and artificial distinctions and imaginary and unexplored grievances, to suppose that we have got to make haste to change all the jury laws of the United States. It is nothing else. I do not know but that the jury laws of the United States could be made better. I wish they could; I wish the jury laws of the State of Vermont could be made better; for at some time and in some way there will be sometimes a trial, even in the rural community where I was born and raised—as I believe they say down South—where it will come to pass that a jury at a particular term is not at all what it ought to be; and if you could explore it, it would be somebody's fault; but when you turn to the statutes you would find that they are as nearly right as human ingenuity can generally make them as to jurors.

There is maladministration; there is local prejudice; there is excitement; there is corruption. These things will break out everywhere now and then. But the laws of the United States coming down to us venerable, (as the Senator from South Carolina so eloquently put it yesterday, let us go back to the days of the fathers—I am now speaking about the other parts of this bill) have provided that the courts of the United States should conform the drawing of their jurors, as near as might be, to the practice of the several States; and then after the liberation of the colored people of the South and in spite of the democratic party, by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments and by the act of 1875 (which this provision repeals and which you would not save yesterday by an amendment) no exclusion should be made on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. These things coming down to us as to conformity from the first, with this new provision as to disqualification for color as the consequence of what has taken place, you have got the system of the fathers now; and yet the honorable Senator from Ohio proposes to overthrow them because somebody has discovered that a republican marshal—I suppose it must have been so from his stating it—somewhere drew all republicans in Indiana or Kentucky or wherever it was on a panel, and on application a republican judge set it aside, and I venture to say if the Senator from Ohio had been that republican judge he would have committed the marshal to prison for contempt if it was within his jurisdiction to do it, and I rather think it would be in such a case for corruption in the presence of the court. Certainly he would have had him laid by the heels by any just President of the United States as quick as the mail could have communicated the information.

It does not do to change your statutes every time that you get a bad marshal. Even in the best regulated times of the orthodox democratic party, studying the public records of my country, I find that there were occasional marshals that did not come to time, that were guilty of corruption and abuse. And there was another thing about them—although that is out of the case—that when they turned out to be defaulters they never or, to borrow a democratic expression, hardly ever through their sureties or otherwise paid up. The records from the Treasury Department will show it to you if you have the curiosity to look. I am afraid it is too much so with republican marshals. I think everybody who does not come to time ought to pay up. But it will not do to go perpetually tinkering at your laws because in one case in fifty thousand or one case in one thousand it turns out that a marshal has been derelict in his duty or that a judge has been derelict in his duty. There is no occasion for jumping out of the frying-pan into the fire and saying because some man guilty of abusing his trust or some court guilty of negligence in not holding him up to time has been partisan in his selection of jurors, therefore hereafter in the State of Vermont, where there are three republicans at least to one democrat, the democrats shall have half the jurors. I do not object to one-half of the jurors in the State of Vermont being democrats as a fact; I do not object to every man on a jury in Vermont in any trial that ever took place there within my recollection being a democrat, just as there are democratic judges on our benches, although I do not know a judge in any one of the counties or in the whole State that could hold the office beyond his time that is out every other year, except by the vote of republicans. That is not it. I beg gentlemen not to understand me as complaining of democratic jurors at all; but I say a law which declares that a jury shall be composed of democrats or of republicans is a vicious law, and it is just as vicious when it says it shall be composed of half and half, as if it said it should be composed of all, so far as the principle of the thing goes; and therefore it is just as vicious, showing its absurdity, when in a State that has three republicans to one democrat you say you will have half democrats on the jury nevertheless, and in that State where, as we are told is the case in some of the Southern States, there are ten democrats to one republican, the republicans shall have half the jurors.

Why, Mr. President, there is no way you can look at it that does not expose, as it appears to me, the vicious absurdity of such a proposition, and the only merit that I can think of its possessing is its novelty and the audacity with which it is gravely put forth.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understood the Senator from Vermont to be descanting upon the defalcations and shortcomings of United States marshals and making some comparative remarks as between the two parties. I rose to ask if he was aware that the republican marshal of Colorado a short time ago was sent to the penitentiary for a defalcation. I understood him to be drawing a comparison very injurious to democrats on that subject, and I wanted to know whether he had lost sight of that case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all, Mr. President. If he had not been a republican marshal and had been a defaulter, he would not have gone to the penitentiary, I am afraid, judging from what I have heard and observed. But I do not intend to go into that question. I thought I had given the marshals on both sides a pretty fair review.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will let me go on. I am afraid of him, and I am sick besides. If he will only just let me finish, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said—probably the Senator did not hear me—that I was afraid it was very much so with republican marshals, or words to that effect, and that I thought that all of them ought to be made to come to time, and not to be defaulters but to do their duty, and that if the law was administered as it ought to be, which is the great trouble with the law everywhere—not that the law itself is not right, but the want of administration—every man charged with public duties who did not do them faithfully and fully would have the penalty of the law by dismissal and by indictment and otherwise visited upon him with certainty, and no intervention of friends and no teasing of Senators and Congressmen or anybody else would get him off, and then you would begin to have the laws well executed.

But that is not the point I am on. I was saying that this political provision is one that is entirely novel as I believe, and I made diligent inquiry with the little capacity I had as a member of the Judiciary Committee upon that subject—I have not any right to say where I made the inquiry—of everybody I could see if he ever knew of such a thing, and everybody allowed he did not; and yet a Senator from somewhere comes in yesterday and says—I think it was the Senator from Ohio—that the law of Pennsylvania is that, and when asked to produce the law or state it he said that there was a law in Pennsylvania that required in each county two jury commissioners to be elected; and it did not allow any single voter to vote for more than one, and the law therefore provided that there should be one republican and one democratic commissioner of juries. That is the precedent and the authority upon which this bill rests. I do not want to waste any time in comment upon the distinction between those two cases.

The result of such a performance will be necessarily, as it appears to me, to make every jury commissioner, the clerk on one side and the commissioner on the other, partisans at once, just as the supervisors of elections and all election officers are known to be partisans. They go to the polls as the advocates and attorneys and watchmen of their respective sides. Now you want to carry that into the administration of justice. There is a natural result of that as to political elections, and I am far from saying that it is not a proper result, because if each man is honest and earnest he wishes to have his side win by every honorable means, by getting in every one of its legal votes and keeping out every one of the illegal votes of the other side. When you go to the jury-box, have you any object to attain as a juror? Do you wish either side to win? Do you wish to know what are the politics of the parties whose cause you are to try? Not so, Mr. President, if you believe in justice, any more than you wish to know what is the religion of the juryman or of the party or of the judge; and it will be a sad day in the history of this Republic when there appears in the statutes of the United States as there has not yet, this first step toward applying political or religious or other tests except those of fidelity to your country and impartiality in the discharge of the duty, to a juryman. First comes politics, in the jury, six and six republicans or democrats, republicans or greenbackers, Catholics or knownothings or whatever they may be. There are your two parties, one a republican the other a democrat, or one a knownothing and the other a man in favor of having everybody of foreign birth, whether naturalized or not, participate in the government of the country, and so on; and you will have done more to obstruct the course of justice that would outweigh by a million-fold the two or three instances that gentlemen think they have heard of where the present laws have been ill-administered to the detriment of justice through the partiality of marshals or the errors of judges. And when you have established the political character of jury trials between man and man, how long will it be before somebody, equally an inventor of great patent rights, some new caucus or other, will bring forward a religious test here and say that we will have two more jury commissioners or clerks, one of whom shall be an orthodox Presbyterian and the other shall be attached to the faith of Rome or whatever so that they shall be of opposite religions? Then first you must get men of opposite parties, second they must be of opposite religions, and so on; the principle is exactly the same.

I do not think that it will bear reflection; but the majority of this body seem to think that it will, or rather, perhaps, they seem to think that it will not, because they would not stop to consider; they push it on; and now let it go. Let it go. I have done all that I can in season and out of season, in committee and out of committee, to restrain what I think very bad legislation. I have not succeeded, but I have done my duty.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I said yesterday that the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was heard by me, as an amendment of course to this bill, for the first time when it was read at the desk; and I said that that might strike the Senate with some surprise, considering that the bill came from the Judiciary Committee, and that the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York were distinguished members of that committee. The Senator from Vermont in the commencement of his remarks last evening, in answer to what I had said and assuming that I was lecturing him and the Senator from New York, and somewhat caustically as he expressed it, complained that the minority in the Judiciary Committee had not had time to consider this measure. Well, now, Mr. President, I must say that that was the first time ever I heard that the minority did not have time for the consideration of this bill. That was the first time I ever heard any complaint of that sort.

Now, I am not going to say what took place in the committee, although I should be perfectly willing to do it. I can only say that we were very pleasant and agreeable to each other, as I hope we always are and always shall be, and I do not wish any wrangle at all about it; but I do solemnly declare that until the Senator from Vermont yesterday said that the minority of that committee had not had time afforded them to prepare their amendments to the bill if they wished to prepare them, I never heard of such a thing.

Mr. President, I believe I will say no more upon that subject, for I certainly do not wish to get into anything that might look like crimination or recrimination, least of all with my friends upon that committee with whom I have served so long, and whom I esteem so highly. Let that pass.

Mr. President, some time ago, when the bill prohibiting military interference with elections was under consideration, the Senator from Vermont delivered an elaborate and carefully prepared speech. For reasons beyond my control I was compelled to be absent from the Senate while he was speaking, but I carefully read his speech as soon as it appeared in the RECORD, and when I read it it did seem to me, to my poor comprehension, that his misinterpretation of that bill, his misinterpretation of what would be the effect of passing that bill, which simply blotted out from the statutes the power of the President to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls, and did nothing more, was intended for nothing more, and upon no fair interpretation could be made to effect anything else—his misinterpretation of that bill, by which he made it to appear, as it seemed to those who believe in everything he says, that if that bill passed the President could not even defend the public property in the city of New York, the custom-house or the post-office on the day of election, that he could not protect any public property anywhere, at any cross-roads in the country on the day of election—I say when I read that, I did think that the sophistry (if I may use that word without offense) of that speech was so transparent that it could impose upon nobody. But yet to my amazement I found that that was the substratum, the bed-rock, the everything, caput et pedes, and corpus too, of a certain document that we got from the other end of the Avenue in a few days.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont is repeating the same performance I fear. He is generating a new veto message. That is the whole meaning of it. He is furnishing sophistries for the people who are not smart enough to invent them themselves in order that they may come back here by a sort of game of battledore and shuttlecock from the other end of the Avenue. That is all there is of it, in my humble judgment.

The Senator from Vermont makes this point, that if we pass this bill we place the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts completely at the mercy of the State Legislatures, and he cites the law of Maryland and says that under that law of Maryland nobody but white men can serve as jurors in the State courts in Maryland, and that as nobody but white men can serve as jurors in the State courts, ergo no men but white men can serve as jurors in the Federal courts if this bill shall pass.

The first thing I have to say in respect to that is that if that would be the effect of this bill, it is precisely the effect of the law as it now stands. If this bill should pass and that would be its effect, it would have no other or different effect than the law as it now stands. Let me see if I am not right in this. What is section 800 of the Revised Statutes?

> Jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each State respectively, shall have the same qualifications, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, and be entitled to the same exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law in such State may have and be entitled to at the time when such jurors for service in the courts of the United States are summoned.

That is to say, jurors in the Federal courts must have when they are summoned the same qualifications that are required of jurors in the highest State courts, at the same time, according to the State law. That is section 800. Now, if that were all, the Senator from Vermont would argue that no colored man can sit as a juror in Maryland in the Federal courts. How could he if his interpretation of the Maryland law is correct? If colored men are excluded from juries there, if whiteness of skin is a qualification for a juror in Maryland, and jurors in the Federal courts must have that qualification because it is required in the State courts, then under the existing law and under the law enacted by my republican friends and continued in force by them and which they wish to perpetuate, no colored man in your State, Mr. President, can serve as a juror unless the famous civil-rights act of 1875 shall have changed it. Let us see what that is. If a colored man can serve as a juror in Maryland in the Federal courts now, why is it that he can serve? The answer of the Senator from Vermont is that he can serve because section 4 of the act of March 1, 1875, the second civil-rights act, is in these words;

> That no citizen possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law shall be disqualified for service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. And any officer or other person charged with any duty in the selection or summoning of jurors who shall exclude or fail to summon any citizen for the cause aforesaid shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not more than $5,000.

That is word for word, letter for letter, punctuation for punctuation, precisely the same thing that the Senator from Vermont offered yesterday as an amendment to this bill. That is all there is of it. He thought that that would have the effect to give to colored men the right to sit on juries. Very well, suppose it does. In the first place, however, allow me to remark that that creates no qualification at all. It simply says a man shall not be rejected for a particular reason. That is, it does not expressly provide any qualification; it simply says that such a thing shall not be a disqualification. That is all it says, and it is only by implication that it says that if a man is otherwise qualified, then he shall be qualified notwithstanding the color of his skin, or his race or previous condition of servitude. Now, it is said that under this fourth section of the act passed—mark it—March 1, 1875, from that time forth colored men are secured the right to serve as jurymen in the Federal courts, and if that provision about the States were constitutional in the State courts too; but that they have the right in the Federal courts. Now mark it, this section 800 goes away back to the year 1840 when it was enacted; it was in point of fact enacted before that, I think as early as 1802, but in its present form substantially it has stood on the statute-book from the year 1840 down to this time.

What was the condition of the colored men in respect to juries prior to the act of 1875? How was it for ten years after the cessation of the civil war? How was it during the whole period of the domination of the republican party in this country from 1861 up to the passage of this civil-rights act of March 1, 1875? How long were they in finding that according to the argument now made by the Senator from Vermont no colored man could sit on a jury-box in your State or in other States of this Union, that one of the qualifications of jurors was that they must be white? I think that they were a little slow about finding it out; and yet I do not remember that there was any very great complaint. In 1875, mark you, Mr. President, fourteen years after the accession of the republican party to power, ten years after the close of the war, there crept in this statute; no, it did not creep, for it came in bold as a lion, this fourth section on which the Senator now relies to secure the rights of colored men to sit on the juries of the country. Well, Mr. President, I have this to say, that if that fourth section does secure the right of colored men to sit on juries in the State of Maryland notwithstanding your State law, if taking section 800 of the Revised Statutes and this section 4 of the civil-rights act of 1875 colored men have a right to sit on juries in the State of Maryland, they have precisely the same right if this bill should pass.

Mr. CONKLING. Will it be agreeable to the Senator to answer me a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I suppose the Senator wants to deal with the point, if there be one, which those who think as I do have in mind; and that point the Senator has entirely avoided if I understand him, therefore I wish to draw his attention to it. In the event of this proposed bill becoming a law, one of its provisions will be that "all general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed." Another one of its provisions will be—I want to find that part of the bill which refers to the time——

Mr. THURMAN. When summoned.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, that is what I want to find. What part of the bill is that? I am not very familiar with the bill and cannot readily find what I wish.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator can only find that by reference to section 800. There is nothing of it in the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon. I understood him to read that.

Mr. THURMAN. I did, but I read it from the statute.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator misled me by his reading. I was right, then, in my impression. One of the provisions of the bill will also be that section 800 is to govern, and in section 800 stand these words:

> Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, and be entitled to the same exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law in such State may have and be entitled to at the time when such jurors for service in the courts of the United States are summoned.

Now the Senator from Ohio will not need a reminder from me that that speaks in the future. No matter what the statute of Maryland or any other State may be to-day, after this bill becomes a law should Maryland and every other State exclude black men by making white blood one of the qualifications of jurors this proposed act declares in effect that that provision shall govern and prevail. Then the Senator has under his hand the act of 1875 which being one of the special laws here referred to, says that no man shall be excluded, if he has the other qualifications, because of his race, color, or previous condition. When this proposed bill becomes a law which enacts that "all general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed," the question will be whether this act of 1875 is repealed. I say that will be the question. In my judgment it will be repealed; but the argument is sufficiently strong if there is only a question about it. If the honorable Senator from Ohio wishing to enlighten me will refer to that point, I shall hear him with great interest.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator would have got all the light I could have given him if he had only waited until I came up to that clause in the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon. He was speaking on a point which I had not heard discussed.

Mr. THURMAN. I certainly intended to speak about it because the Senator from Vermont laid much stress upon it. Now as to the future language, how is the future language made applicable at all in the law? How is it that we have the time fixed that they shall have the qualifications at the time when they are summoned? Does this bill use that future language for the first time? No, sir, it is in the existing law, and if you defeat this bill it will still be the law. So apart from the fourth section of the act of March 1, 1875, if that were out of the statute-book, the very case that both Senators suppose of States making disqualification for membership of a jury on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude could take place.

Mr. CONKLING. But for the act of 1875?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely, and now you propose to repeal the act of 1875.

Mr. THURMAN. No, we do not propose to repeal that act at all upon any principle of just construction, and a man would be laughed at by a sensible judge who would contend that there was any repeal in this case of that act.

Mr. President, I have shown you that these future words are in the existing law, and if the law stands, this very case which the Senators have supposed of excluding all colored men from the jury-box in a State court and therefore excluding them from the jury-box in the Federal court, could happen just as easily as if this bill passed, just as easily in the one case as in the other. But, says the Senator from New York, that cannot happen as long as section 4 of the act of 1875 remains. Perhaps not in the Federal courts. I incline to think not. In fact I do not have to think anything about it, I will say not because the act so far as jurors in the Federal courts are concerned, so far as the provision in the fourth section of the act of 1875 which undertakes to prescribe the qualifications of jurors in the State courts is concerned, I say as I said when that bill was under consideration, I say as the Senator from Wisconsin then a member of the Judiciary Committee and now a member of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. CARPENTER] not only said but proved, I say as he demonstrated that the Supreme Court of the United States had twice decided, that the provision in that section undertaking to prescribe qualifications for jurors in the State courts is a plain and flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States. I said so then with due respect to all who entertained a different opinion. But so far as prescribing the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts is concerned, nothing can be said against the constitutionality of that fourth section, for it certainly is within the competency of Congress to declare what shall be the qualifications of jurors in the Federal courts. Nobody denies that. And therefore when Congress said on the 1st of March, 1875, to the Federal judges—it is to them that the statute speaks—"you shall not reject a man on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," although that did not in express terms say that any particular man should be qualified to serve, yet by fair implication, by fair intendment, nay not only by fair but by necessary intendment, it did qualify men to serve without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude if they had the other qualifications provided for in the laws of the State in respect to jurors in the highest State court.

Then, Mr. President, the whole thing comes to this: will the repealing section of this act repeal section 4 of the act of March 1, 1875? Let us see what is the principle in respect of interpreting a law on the subject of repeal. Now mark it, there is no act mentioned here by name:

> All general and special laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

That specifies no act by name. What is the effect, then, of such a clause as that? It is not worth the ink with which it is written. Strike that sentence wholly from this bill, and the bill will be in legal effect precisely the same thing that it is now.

Mr. CONKLING. What is it in for?

Mr. THURMAN. You know how such things creep in. They become a matter of form. There is not the least use in the wide world for those words in this bill, because as a matter of course laws that are in conflict with this later law are repealed by this later law by implication, and to say at the end of a bill "that all laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed" is nothing in the world, but to say that previous laws that are in conflict with this law are repealed by the implication of this law. They are not expressly repealed. There is not one of them named.

Then comes the question, is the act of 1875 repealed by implication by the passage of this act if this sentence were left out? What is the rule in regard to repeals by implication? In this Senate of lawyers it is hardly necessary to state it. The repugnancy between two statutes that creates a repeal by implication must, in the language of the courts, be so manifest that the two cannot by any possible reasonable interpretation stand together. It must not be a repugnancy created by argument, as judge after judge has said. It is not a repugnancy to be shown by argument. It must be so plain, so manifest that by no fair interpretation whatsoever can the two statutes stand. If by any fair interpretation they can stand, there is no repeal by implication. I could pile the desks up here almost ceiling-high with the uniform decisions on this subject, and decisions, too, illustrating this principle by cases so strong that a man would have to be a bold man who could get up here and say for one moment that the fourth section of the act of 1875 would be repealed by this bill should it become a law.

Let us see what there is that is inconsistent with that act. The first sentence in this bill is a sentence regulating the pay of jurymen. Of course there is nothing inconsistent there. The second is:

> That the last clause of section 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which refers to the State of Pennsylvania, and sections 801, 820, and 821 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are hereby repealed.

The last clause of section 800 refers to Pennsylvania alone; section 801 refers to Pennsylvania alone; it refers to the mode of drawing jurors in that State alone, and there is not one single word in either section in regard to the qualifications of jurors. So far there is no repugnancy whatever between this bill and the fourth section of the act of March, 1875.

Then sections 820 and 821 are repealed. These are the test-oath sections. Their repeal has nothing in the wide world to do with the question of whether a man can be excluded from the jury-box on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Everybody must admit that. There is not a word in them about race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and therefore there is no repugnancy in them that could in any way affect the fourth section of the act of March 1, 1875.

Then:

> And that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less than three hundred persons.

That is a mere mode of getting a jury and has nothing to do with qualifications. But then come these words:

> Possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes.

And there is supposed to be a repugnancy. There is no repugnancy at all between them. These jurors must possess certain qualifications, the qualifications prescribed in section 800; but non constat that a man may be rejected on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, for here comes the act of March 1, 1875, the fourth section, which limits that language precisely as it limits the language in section 800 as it now stands. Section 800 is not repealed by this bill. This provision in this bill simply repeats section 800. These words in this bill "possessing the same qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes" might be stricken out of this bill and the bill would be just as perfect as it now is with them in it. It does not change the existing law one iota, and so far as there being any repugnancy whatever between that and the fourth section of the act of March 1, 1875, they are just as harmonious and stand just as well together as they do at this present day. So they would if this bill passed.

Then what else is there in the bill?

> Which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein.

Of course nobody would pretend that that, which is mere modus, has anything to do with the qualifications of a juror. Then comes a clause:

> But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent any judge in a district in which such is now the practice from ordering the names of jurors to be drawn from the boxes used by the State authorities in selecting jurors in the highest courts of the State.

Why is that put in? There was a motion made to strike it out yesterday, and to my astonishment made by the Senator from Vermont. Why is that put in? Because in certain States the States permit the names in the State boxes to be used by the Federal marshal. I am told that is the case in Vermont; I am told that is the case in New York, and that is the case in several other States. This bill says the judge may continue that course if he sees fit. That is in perfect harmony with the object of this bill, because as we all know under the State laws which regulate the putting of the names in those State boxes there can be no packing of juries, there is no packing of juries. The laws of Connecticut, as my friend well knows, take good care that the jury in effect and practice shall consist of men of all political parties. So they do in New York where they take the whole assessment-roll as I am told by the Senator from New York and where the man who shakes up the boxes has to get a long poll in order to stir them up—fifteen or twenty thousand names——

Mr. CONKLING. What Senator from New York said that?

Mr. THURMAN. I was alluding to the Senator before me. I thought he told me they put in a box all the names on the assessment-roll.

Mr. CONKLING. The imagination of the honorable Senator from Ohio is so exuberant that it perpetually misleads and entangles him. I never heard of such a thing.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well. If I said it was sixteen feet high I will stand to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. I believe the Senator would. Now as I see the Senator is very good-natured I wonder if he will allow me to ask a question.

Mr. THURMAN. No, I will not; because you will make a speech right in the middle of mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator was in such a bad humor yesterday that I really thought he was in good nature to-day.

Mr. THURMAN. I am in good humor to-day and I do not want to get in bad humor, as I might if the Senator got after me.

There are thus States in which the State laws secure a perfectly fair representation to people of all shades of political opinion, religion, and everything else. If the laws of the State of Ohio permitted the names of jurors in the Federal courts to be drawn out of the State boxes, if that were a practicable thing according to our system of drawing jurors, we never should have any reason to complain of a packed jury in the Federal courts in Ohio; and I should be perfectly content, so far as Ohio is concerned, if the law stood just precisely as it is. But that cannot be done in Ohio. It is impossible for the Federal courts in Ohio or in Indiana or in Illinois or in a dozen other States that I could mention to draw the jurors' names out of the State boxes. Where it is practicable to draw them out of the State boxes and where that has been the practice we leave the judge to continue that practice, which is an unexceptionable one and secures fair and impartial juries. That has nothing to do with the qualification of jurors, of course, except this, I beg my friends to remark, that if that is the course pursued in your State, Mr. President, then if no names but those of white men go into the boxes, none but those of white men will come out of them; that is exactly the case under existing law.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that the Senator's opinion?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not say that. I say that would be exactly the case under the law which you wish to leave unchanged and unmodified.

Mr. CONKLING. How could that be when the act of 1875 speaks.

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, but I say if the practice is there under the present law to draw men from the State boxes, if that is done under the authority given to the Federal court by section 800, and it is a law that goes away back to 1802, and I do not know but back of that—if that is the case there that the names are all drawn out of the State boxes and Maryland puts none but the names of white men in those boxes, none but the names of white men will come out, and that under this very law which you are seeking to perpetuate and which cannot be made one particle worse by the passage of this bill.

Mr. President, now what next:

> And no person shall serve as a petit juror more than one term in any one year, nor be compelled to serve as such juror more than two weeks at any term unless it be necessary in order to complete the trial of a cause in which he may have been impaneled; and all juries to serve in courts after the passage of this act shall be drawn in conformity herewith.

Plainly there is not one word that is in the slightest respect repugnant to the fourth section of the act of March 1, 1875, and therefore if this fourth section of the act of March 1, 1875, has the effect to prevent the exclusion of colored men from a jury notwithstanding the language of section 800, which this bill does not propose to touch in one single iota but to leave it just as it is—if the fourth section of the act of March 1, 1875, has the effect to remedy that which my friends say is a wrong, then it will have precisely the same effect if this bill should pass, for there is not one single word in this bill that is so manifestly repugnant to the fourth section of the act of March 1, 1875, that it would operate as a repeal of that section.

Mr. President, this is all that I deem it necessary to say upon this subject except one thing. I am most sincerely impressed with the importance of this question. I believe, notwithstanding all that has been said in defense of these laws as they now stand, that these laws which we seek to repeal are a disgrace to the country. In respect to test oaths, I confess that I did hardly expect to find them defended at this day on the floor of the Senate of the United States—test oaths for jurors, test oaths in general! I know that a celebrated writer has said that there are men at this day in Great Britain who deplore almost in sackcloth and ashes the abolition of the test oaths that were enacted in the time of Queen Elizabeth to enforce the use of the book of common prayer and the ritual as her majesty as the head of the church prescribed it. I know there are men who regret almost in sackcloth and ashes the abolition of the test oath which kept every Catholic out of Parliament and out of every public employment in Great Britain, and out of the juries, too, as my friend from Delaware suggests. I know there are men whose Christianity is so intense that they feel very unhappy indeed when looking at the English statutes they find that the test oath which excluded all Jews from public employment and from public office has been stricken out. And I do suppose that there never will be a time until that millennium shall come of which we have read and of which we have heard, when there will not be men seeking to use test oaths to disfranchise and exclude from public employment and exclude from liberty itself the men to whom they are politically opposed. But I did not expect to hear such a warm advocacy of test-oath acts in the American Senate in the year of grace 1879.

Mr. President, if the American people are in favor of these modes of disfranchising men, if the American people are in favor of these modes of depriving a portion of the people of this country who owe allegiance to the Constitution as much as all others, who perform their constitutional duties as much as all others, who in time of war are liable to serve in the Army as much as any other men in the country, who may shed their blood, and be compelled to shed it, and are compelled to pour out their treasure every year for the support and maintenance of the Government—if the people of the United States want to disfranchise these men, to make them a disgraced and degraded caste in this country, pariahs in their native land, they can do it; but it will not be that American people that made the Declaration of Independence in 1776, and who stood by it through the severest sufferings that men ever endured until they came out triumphant in the land and made it a beacon-light for the guidance of all lovers of freedom throughout the world.

Mr. President, I said that I did not want any sophistry uttered at this end of the Avenue to reverberate from the other end; and furthermore, I felt a little bit hurt that my friends, the minority of the Judiciary Committee, should think that they had not been treated with due consideration. It was the first I ever heard of it. I never imagined it before; and feeling in that way, and anxious to remove every possible stumbling-block of offense, even to the crossing of a t or the dotting of an i; willing to remove and anxious to remove every single word or letter in this bill that could be misinterpreted, I signified to the Senator from Vermont that I was willing, by unanimous consent, to reconsider the vote by which the bill went through its third reading, so that it might be still open to amendment. He intimated, as I understood him, that if I would then agree that it might be recommitted to the committee he would assent to that proposition. So I understood him. I endeavored to make that proposition to him afterward, but he would not submit to it, and said—I do not know whether he said it for the purpose of being reported or not, but quite audibly so as to be heard all over here, that this bill had to pass as it is. Well, Mr. President, if it has to pass as it is, so be it. It is not yet out of the power of the men who intend to frame the laws as far as they have the power to do it in this session of the Congress of the United States, and perhaps it may be found that no such tactics can have any other effect than to delay the passage of the bill and possibly to prolong this session of Congress. But now in a spirit of perfect fairness I say to those who passed this bill through its third reading, that the vote by which it was read the third time can be yet reconsidered; that is to say, although one motion to reconsider has been voted down, another motion may be made, if there is unanimous consent. So our rules provide. If there is unanimous consent, I for one will agree to move a reconsideration of the vote by which this bill was ordered to its third reading and was read the third time; and then, if any single Senator on this floor, republican or democrat, asks that the bill shall be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee, I will vote for the recommittal, and do all I can, and I have no doubt successfully, to secure the recommittal.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I merely wish to correct an impression which I think the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] unintentionally made in regard to the mode of drawing jurors in the State of Maryland. The Senator from Vermont referred to the State of Maryland as a sample State in which none but white citizens could be drawn upon juries, and he read from a section of the law, correctly as far as he went, but knowing that he was falling into an error, I called his attention to the fact that that was only one of the preliminary stages in the preparation of a proper list from which jurors were to be selected. The Senator from Vermont read a little further and discovered what I wished to call his attention to, but it was in such a way that the rest of the Senate did not get the benefit of the light which I knew would fall at once on the pathway of the Senator when he read a little further. Now, I wish to state to the Senate, and very briefly, that the law to which he referred is one of the most generous and liberal and proper laws for the purpose of getting an impartial jury that can possibly be invented by man.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Put it right into this bill bodily the next time you get a chance.

Mr. WHYTE. It is already in the bill; it is the law to-day, but your United States marshal in Maryland tramples it under foot, and your judge of the circuit court does not enforce the law as it stands, and he laughs it to scorn and selects the juries to suit himself, without any reference to the law as it now stands upon the statute-book. He can pack any jury he pleases to convict anybody who is charged with crime, just as thoroughly as your drum-head court-martials and military commissions convicted during the war.

Mr. CONKLING. That is by disregarding the law, I understand the Senator?

Mr. WHYTE. By trampling under foot the law, as the Supreme Court of the United States said was done in trying men by military tribunals when the courts of justice were open for their trial. This law, if it were followed, would give a man in the United States court in Maryland charged with the commission of a political offense a fair chance for trial and for acquittal; but as it stands now it is a miracle if any democrat is acquitted by a republican jury, chosen by the marshal on his own volition, chosen from the individuals whom he has in his eye and seeks to bring into the court of justice to administer the law. He may summon only republicans if he chooses, and does summon one, two, or three democrats on his panels at every term of the court, and they are challenged or stricken from the list; so that it is almost impossible to get one democrat on the trial of a party charged with the commission of a political offense.

But the law of Maryland, intending to compel men of property and men of intelligence to serve upon the juries, imposed upon the clerks of the courts the furnishing of a list taken from the white taxable inhabitants resident in the county where the clerk was who was exercising his office. That is but one list. Then the judges are directed to send into the clerk's office of their court and get the poll-books of the last election returned by the judges of election to the clerk's office, and take those poll-books and select men, whether tax-payers or not tax-payers, white or black, and make up a certain number of names which are written upon ballots and put in a box, and from that box is drawn the panel of jurors to be used in the incoming term of court. The law is express in requiring that those jurors shall be men of intelligence, of character, without any reference to their color or their previous condition of servitude. Nothing of that is to come into question. But they must be men of intelligence, of character, of sobriety, and without the least reference to their political opinion.

Now, let us see what the law of Vermont is, to which my friend, the Senator from Florida, [Mr. JONES,] calls my attention. The first section provides for grand and petit jurors, in regard to the venire and so on. The second——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps I can aid my friend.

Mr. WHYTE. We want to see whether your law does not conform very nearly to ours; that is all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only trouble with our law is that there is not any "white" in it. It has no color of any kind.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly. My friend from Florida will read it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. This is the law of Vermont:

SECTION 1. Previous to the stated term of each county court to be held next after the last day of April in each year, the clerk of such court shall seasonably issue and deliver to the sheriff of the county, or his deputy, a venire commanding such officer to summon eighteen judicious men, within such county, from the several towns in such county, as the judges of such court shall direct, to appear before such court at nine o'clock, forenoon, on the first day of the term, to serve as grand jurors in such court.

This uses the term "judicious men;" and I say that under that statute the officer could select judicious men and thereby exclude men of color or of foreign birth, as in his judgment he might think proper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senator from Florida whether he thinks the constitution of the State would make any difference which said there should not be any such distinction?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, no, it would not affect the matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The constitution would not affect it! Very well, that is all that can be said about it!

Mr. WHYTE. The section which the Senator from Vermont read from the Maryland law contains the word "white"—"white male taxable inhabitants." The object, I will explain, of that clause was to compel those who paid taxes to serve on juries. Then the second section of the law provides that that list shall be taken up by the judge:

Before the beginning of the second regular term of said courts after each and every general election held thereafter, a fair and complete list of the white male taxable inhabitants or residents of said county, whose names appear on the tax-books of said county, and who are not known to said clerk to be under the age of twenty-five years, and to which said lists so to be made and filed the said clerks respectively shall append a certificate, &c.

Then the judge of the court calls the members of the bar into court to see that everything proceeds fairly; and in their presence the judges—proceed to select from the lists last finished by the clerks of the county commissioners, provided for in the first section of this act, and from the poll-books of the several election districts of said counties, that shall be returned and filed in the clerk's office of said courts after any general election that may be last held previously to such election, a panel to consist of the names of two hundred persons, &c.

So, in order, as I say, to get at the tax-payers who are eternally seeking to be relieved from the performance of jury duty, to compel their names to be got at, which can only be obtained from the tax-lists, the law requires the clerks of the courts to furnish a certain number of names from those tax lists. Then, in order to make an impartial jury, so that a man without property may be tried by his peers also without property, the door is opened to the poll-book where a man is enabled to exercise, as he did in our State, the right of suffrage without even paying a poll tax, without owning a dollar's worth of property in the world, to get at those names for the purpose of making up a complete list of two hundred or three hundred from which the jury for the term is to be selected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question for information?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it the practice under these laws of Maryland for colored men to be drawn on juries of the State courts?

Mr. WHYTE. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that in the United States courts they serve, but I do not know whether negroes have been called to juries in the counties; in Baltimore City they have not. Whether it has been done purposely or not, I cannot state.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator know any instance under the laws of Maryland in which he has seen or heard of a descendant of the African race in the jury-box?

Mr. WHYTE. I have never heard the subject discussed. I do not know whether in the counties they have or not. I do not practice law in the counties and, therefore, I do not speak from any knowledge. I never have heard one way or the other on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator has no information that a colored man ever sat in a State jury-box in Maryland?

Mr. WHYTE. I have not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither have I or anybody else.

Mr. WHYTE. None whatever, but it may be true that they never did sit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And it is; and it is probable the juries are lawful juries.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know how it happens that they are not drawn. All I know is that this law is complied with in all the courts. There is no discrimination on the poll-books. The names of the white man and the black man go upon the poll-books side by side without any mark whatever to indicate whether a man is white or black. Consequently there are no stereotyped jurors with us; there are no jurors that make a business of serving upon the juries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But there are those who make a business of not serving, it appears.

Mr. WHYTE. There are some, I say, who do try to shirk their responsibility.

Mr. CONKLING. Are those black men?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know whether they are or not. I am not as familiar with them probably as other people may be, but I have never yet known a word of complaint from any quarter, white or black, in regard to the juries in Maryland. I have never heard of a black man who wanted to serve upon a jury who was denied the privilege of serving. I never heard of a black man being rejected from a list because he was black.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And yet the Senator says, if I understood him, that the poll-list, that he supposes to be one independent source of drawing, contains, just as they run along alphabetically, the names of black men and white men; but still it happens in some way that under the laws of Maryland the white man's name comes out every time and the black man's stays in.

Mr. WHYTE. So it is. But how is it in Vermont; how many black men sit on juries there?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are in proportion to population.

Mr. WHYTE. Do they appear? Are they summoned?

Mr. EDMUNDS. They are summoned because the constitution of Vermont says that in no earthly respect shall distinction of race, color, or creed ever be made; and the law following that says that at the respective meetings every year of each municipality the voters of that municipality shall have presented to them by the justices of the peace, who are elected at the freemen's election of the year before, a list of the persons whose names are to go into the jury-box. It is a nomination. The voters reject some, or amend by putting in other names if there appear to be any wrong on the list furnished. This is done publicly. The names go into the box in every town. A county is composed of say twenty towns, and, therefore, there will be twenty boxes or two hundred or three hundred names in them all, taking them together, according to the population of the towns. Then, as according to the law which has been read, when a term is about to be held the judge directs a venire to be issued to the sheriff commanding him to summon five jurors from town A, four from town B, one from town C, according to population, as nearly as the judge can. He goes to that box; it is shaken up by the clerk; one name is drawn out by lot, and then another and another until the number called for from that town is furnished. The black men go in with the white men. They are very few, to be sure, in proportion, but they go in, as I have seen them in the jury-box, and they are drawn out by towns like the other.

Mr. WHYTE. But they do not get into the box by chance. They are nominated, they are specially nominated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. WHYTE. That is the difference. Here these lists are made out by chance, and they are put in the box and are drawn also by chance. The judges do not know who the men are, the judges do not know whether they are white or black. It is impossible, I tell the Senator from Vermont, it is absolutely impossible to take the poll-books and select one hundred names from them and tell whether they are white or black.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, but it is absolutely possible, it appears, to take one hundred names from the poll-books that do turn out to be wholly white, when if you took them alphabetically a third or a quarter would be black. How is that?

Mr. WHYTE. But they are not taken alphabetically. They are taken from the names as they come on the poll-books.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are they taken by chance?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not know how the poll-books are kept in Vermont, but in Maryland they are kept by putting down names as men come to vote. The votes are not cast alphabetically; each name is recorded as the voter comes up, and it may be that W begins the list, and A comes next; they are not arranged alphabetically. It is not a registration list; it is the poll-book.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How can it happen, then—I suppose one-fourth of the voters of Maryland are blacks, are they not?

Mr. WHYTE. Not so many as one-fourth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. One-eighth?

Mr. WHYTE. Probably one-eighth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Therefore in the poll-books, running right down without regard to the alphabet, there would be the name of one colored man in eight as you go through the whole list. If they are taken out by chance, how can it happen that year after year that chance will never hit a certain eighth of that list?

Mr. WHYTE. I cannot tell how it happens, Mr. President, nor can anybody else tell you how it happens; but it is perfectly certain that it does happen, and happens in every county in the State, whether there are republican judges in it or not; and it is a most remarkable thing that when the republican party were in power in Maryland they did not devise a means to put the black man in the jury-box without any chance about it. If they found there was an injustice done to the colored man, why did they not remedy it?

It was left to the democratic party, not to the republican party, to give the negro the right to testify in the courts after the republicans had held power in that State for years; it was left to my administration, notwithstanding their control of the State for years during the war and toward its close, to appropriate large sums of money to educate the negro. They did nothing for him in my State, nothing to elevate him, nothing to protect him. We have opened wide the door for him everywhere, and put up no bars to his advancement since we have had the power. We have conformed to the amendment of the Constitution in regard to suffrage, though our people were almost unanimously against it—I mean the voting population of that day. Immediately upon its adoption we opened the door wide to them, and admitted them to every right, to every privilege which we enjoyed; and no better class of people can be found anywhere in any State than the negroes of Maryland. I speak of them as they deserve to be spoken of, orderly, loving the Constitution and the laws as they understand them and as far as they understand them; they are struggling to elevate themselves; but not one of them that I have heard cried because their names were not drawn out of the box and they made jurors of. Here and there you see a stray one in the United States court, on the grand jury, as a monument that the republican party do not exclude them, and one on the petit jury probably, but in the other courts they are not drawn because their names do not come out of the box by the ordinary drawing, which is carried on under this law under the eyes of republican judges as well as democratic judges, and no man has ever said there was the smallest, the slightest unfairness in the drawings of the juries in any court of the State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is. I think they follow the law.

Mr. WHYTE. They do follow the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the black man's name does not come out.

Mr. WHYTE. The law was intended to protect all alike and get a fair and impartial jury. It is for that reason that I vote for this bill, to get a fair and impartial jury. I vote for that anomalous clause in this bill in regard to political parties, requiring the commissioner to be of an opposite political party to the clerk of the court; and why do I vote for it? In order that we may be no longer subjected to the treatment which the democrats in Maryland have received at the hands of the United States marshal of that State since the republicans have had control of it, where our people are excluded, white men excluded from the United States jury-box if they are democrats. Why is that? Why is the law allowed to be administered in the United States courts so that republicans are chosen, if not all republicans for every panel only one or two exceptions to relieve them from the stigma that they were partisan juries, summoned to try political offenses? No wonder we have to resort to anomalous provisions of law; no wonder we have to inject in the laws of our country strange provisions that are rendered necessary by the strange provisions which the republican party has ingrafted upon the legislation of our country. It is to meet those political laws which you have passed to punish people because they vote their sentiments in contradistinction to the sentiments of the republicans. Who can point his finger at a republican convicted by republican juries of political offenses? No, Mr. President, when they are caught in violating the election laws and indicted in the State courts, and when the hand of the law is about being laid upon them, your laws come in and give them the power of removing their trials to the United States courts, where they can be acquitted by republican juries.

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator pauses a moment, if he will allow me I should like to ask him a question?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator said a moment ago that republicans had ingrafted statutes upon the statute-books under which those republican juries were drawn——

Mr. WHYTE. No, I did not say any such thing. I said the republicans had ingrafted such legislation in regard to political offenses. That is what I said.

Mr. CONKLING. Not in regard to juries?

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What the Senator means is the removal of causes, I suppose.

Mr. WHYTE. No, sir, the making of the violation of State laws triable in the United States courts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What statute does the Senator refer to?

Mr. WHYTE. I mean the statute which punishes people for violating the election laws of the States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What statute is that? I do not know of any such statute.

Mr. WHYTE. If you had been a democrat in Maryland and had inadvertently violated one, Judge Bond would have very soon shown you where the statute was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should hope neither of those things would happen to me.

Mr. WHYTE. I am sure of that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In all seriousness I should like to have the Senator tell us exactly what statute he refers to?

Mr. WHYTE. The statute is, according to my recollection——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know of any statute of the United States that punishes a violation of State laws except the health statute passed the other day.

Mr. WHYTE. Is there not a statute of the United States that punishes a violation of the State law in regard to registry?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know of it.

Mr. WHYTE. Is there not a statute which punishes a man for failing to register a party?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know of it.

Mr. VOORHEES. In response to the Senator from Maryland I can show the section——

Mr. WHYTE. So can I; only I have not time just now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see the section.

Mr. WHYTE. I think it is 2220, according to my recollection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is not any such section. We are disputing about terms. The section the Senator refers to punishes the violation of what the law of the United States forbids. That is what it punishes.

Mr. WHYTE. I know the fine point that the Senator from Vermont wants to make. I have the statute-book.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to allude to anything sectional but I must ask for the section. [Laughter.] I did not mean to unduly disturb the Senator from Maryland. If it is not convenient for him to refer to it, I beg that he will not consider himself obliged to do so.

Mr. WHYTE. The Senator does not disturb me. I had only risen for a moment to point out what I thought was a mistake of the Senator from Vermont in regard to the drawing of jurors in the State of Maryland; but I can show the Senator, I think, the section to which I referred in a moment. Here is a section relating to fraudulent registration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the number?

Mr. WHYTE. Section 5512. There is no registration in my State except a State registration. There is no provision of a law of the United States to make any other registration. There is no person authorized to make a registration but a State officer. And yet section 5512 says:

> If, at any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, any person knowingly personates and registers, or attempts to register, in the name of any other person, whether living, dead, or fictitious, or fraudulently registers, or fraudulently attempts to register, not having a lawful right so to do; or does any unlawful act to secure registration for himself or any other person; or by force, threat, menace, intimidation, bribery, reward, or offer, or promise thereof, or other unlawful means, prevents or hinders any person having a lawful right to register from duly exercising such right; or compels or induces by any of such means, or other unlawful means, any officer of registration to admit to registration any person not legally entitled thereto—

And so on, going through a calendar of crimes against the State law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly tell us whereabouts the State law is mentioned there?

Mr. WHYTE. Of course it is not mentioned there; but where is there any other law than the State law which authorizes a registration at all?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure the honorable Senator did not mean to cite this section in support of what he said that the act of Congress undertook to punish a violation of State law. Certainly I do not know of any provision of any law of the State of Vermont and I do not know that there is any in Maryland, which punishes any one of these things in respect of registry——

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, there is in my State.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the manner named here, because we have not any such thing as registration in the State of Vermont, except in one or two isolated instances respecting certain cities and municipalities. This—if the Senator will pardon me, and I do not mean to intrude upon him improperly—this is exactly like those other statutes of the United States that have come down to us from the fathers, that we are all so fond of, which say if any man counterfeits the coin of the United States he shall be punished. The State law says exactly the same thing. This law says that if any man undertakes to prevent a citizen of the United States, who is lawfully entitled to vote for a national Representative, from doing that thing in a lawful way, he shall be punished. In both the instances the act of Congress punishes the act and the State law, if it happens to do it, punishes the same act also. That is all there is to it.

Mr. WHYTE. I know the fine-spun reasoning of the Senator from Vermont; I know he argues that all these laws are right, that they are all constitutional, that they do not do what we say they do. I know all that; and if I hoped to convince the Senator from Vermont that the views I entertain are right or that his are wrong, I should certainly undertake a task which would be utterly hopeless in the beginning; but I say, according to my understanding of the law, that it does punish for an offense known only to the laws of Maryland, an offense committed against a system known only to the laws of Maryland so far as offenses committed in that State are concerned, and that there is no such thing as a registration of voters for an election for Representative in Congress. The registration is made for the election of State officers and the electors who are entitled to vote for members of the lower branch of the Legislature are entitled to vote for members of the United States House of Representatives, and this is punishing in the United States courts a violation of the registration law of Maryland. It is mere special pleading to say you adopt the act as your own, just as the committee that brought in this bundle of absurdities in 1869 and placed them not upon the article of the Constitution recently referred to, but under the article for the general welfare of the country, just as all of these laws proceed upon the theory that you punish the act and you adopt the officers of the State as officers of the United States. It is a mere theoretical mode of dealing with a practical subject.

No, Mr. President, I only rose thinking that I could correct the Senator from Vermont in regard to his strictures upon the jury law of Maryland, and to show the Senator that no colored man is precluded from serving either in the State courts or in the United States courts, but that the lists are wide open, the poll-books of all the counties, to the poorer inhabitants without property and the white inhabitants with property. The white man with property who pays taxes, is compelled to go into the jury-box side by side with the cottager who is unable to pay probably more than for the cow or the horse that he has in his stable.

Another clause of this law in regard to United States statutes punishing for State offenses is suggested to me by my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON,] but——

Mr. DAWES. The Senator a few moments since was denouncing laws that punished men for voting their sentiments. The Senator has the statutes in his hands. He would do me a great favor if he would point out those laws.

Mr. WHYTE. I did not say the law did so. I said the administration of the law brought that result. I said that the administration of the law was this: you denounce a crime, you specify what shall be a crime; and if a man commits that crime, or is supposed to commit it, he is indicted by partisans of an opposite party to himself and tried by a jury of opposite partisans to himself.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator know of any law that punishes a man for voting his sentiments?

Mr. WHYTE. I do not, but I know of the perversion of the law which has punished men in my State within the last six months.

Mr. DAWES. For voting their sentiments?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes; for voting their sentiments because they were democrats. Without proof that justified the conviction they were convicted.

Mr. DAWES. Can the Senator give us the form of the indictment?

Mr. WHYTE. No, Mr. President, forms are nothing. I give the substance by pointing to men in jail and convicted upon such indictments.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator so describe the proceeding under which a man was punished for voting his sentiments, that we shall be able to understand how it was done?

Mr. WHYTE. Well, Mr. President, I made the statement——

Mr. DAWES. So I understood.

Mr. WHYTE. I made the statement that a man of opposite political opinions had no chance of a fair and impartial trial with a partisan jury made up of ex-custom-house officers and men looking for employment in the custom-house and other offices of the Government; no chance whatever.

Mr. DAWES. Do they try and punish men in Maryland because they vote, whether they vote their sentiments or not? Is the particular way in which a man votes, whether it happens to be his own sentiments or not, a ground of offense?

Mr. WHYTE. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. DAWES. Is it an offense punished in Maryland by the practice of the courts the way in which a man votes?

Mr. WHYTE. I only speak of the effect. I only speak of the use that is made of these laws by republican officials to punish men of opposite political sentiments; and I speak of the positive fact that every republican official indicted in the State courts for violating the State laws, supervisor or marshal, immediately removes his trial into the United States court where he can be tried by men of his own political party.

Mr. DAWES. And gets punished for it.

Mr. WHYTE. No; and is not punished for it.

Mr. DAWES. But the Senator was speaking of men being punished for voting their sentiments.

Mr. WHYTE. Yes; so I say still. The democrats are punished and the republicans go scot free.

Mr. DAWES. I suppose the democrats are punished because they do not remove their cases to the United States courts.

Mr. WHYTE. No; they are indicted in the United States courts by the republican juries and tried by republican juries.

Mr. DAWES. And punished for voting a particular way?

Mr. WHYTE. Punished because the republican partisans find them guilty for the purpose of punishing them.

Mr. DAWES. Punished because they are found guilty?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes; found guilty whether the evidence is for them or against them.

Mr. DAWES. That is a bad state of things in Maryland.

Mr. WHYTE. It is a very bad state of things, and that is what this bill is intended to remedy precisely. I am glad that the Senator from Massachusetts has waked up to the fact that it is a bad state of things, and it is time that such as he should find a proper remedy.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. WHYTE. I am afraid I am taking up the time of other Senators by yielding. I had better finish the few remarks I had intended to make.

Mr. DAWES. I only wanted to say that I was sorry that the Senator from Maryland on the other hand confessed that the object of this bill was to prevent men from being punished who were found guilty.

Mr. WHYTE. The object of this bill is to prevent men from being punished who are unjustly found guilty, and to give those who are on trial a fair and impartial trial, to give them a chance of acquittal if they deserve it, and not make the man respond guilty when he goes into the jury-box.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator keeps his adverbs too far from his verbs to make him intelligible.

Mr. WHYTE. I do not propose to go back to school again and to be educated in syntax. [Laughter.] Now, if it was my friend, the colleague of the Senator from Massachusetts, whom I well remember in the secluded niches of the library at Harvard University, I would yield because I know how lately he came from the groves of alma mater.

Section 5506 is another section:

> Every person who, by any unlawful means, hinders, delays, prevents, or obstructs, or combines and confederates with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be fined not less than $500, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

If that is not punishing a man for violating a State law, I do not know what is. Now the Senator from Vermont, like our distinguished friend the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] has retired from the field, after asking me to find him the law—here it is—where the violation of a State law is punished in the United States courts. Section 2005 provides that—

> When, under the authority of the constitution or laws of any State, or the laws of any Territory, any act is required to be done as a prerequisite or qualification for voting, and by such constitution or laws persons or officers are charged with the duty of furnishing to citizens an opportunity to perform such prerequisite, or to become qualified to vote, every such person and officer shall give to all citizens of the United States the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite, and to become qualified to vote.
> SEC. 2006. Every person or officer charged with the duty specified in the preceding section, who refuses or knowingly omits to give full effect to that section, shall forfeit the sum of $500 to the party aggrieved by such refusal or omission, to be recovered by an action on the case, with costs, and such allowance for counsel fees as the court may deem just.

Here are plenty of these laws punishing for a violation of the State law and then indicting and trying the man for a violation of the law by a jury almost exclusively of partisans opposed in politics to the man on trial. I venture to affirm that in no case has a man been tried and convicted in my State who was indicted in a State court and removed his trial to the United States court.

Mr. President, is it any wonder that we want to change this law? Is it any wonder that we want to have an impartial jury? Is it any wonder that if these political offenses are to be tried we want to divide the number to be put into the box? No man can tell how they will come out. It only requires that the man to be a commissioner shall be of opposite political opinions from the clerk, to prevent the clerk from putting in the box men all of his political persuasion. It is not intended that the clerk shall put republicans in and the commissioner democrats and vice versa, but it is to protect us from having the boxes and the lists made up of partisans opposed in politics to the man who is to be indicted and tried. The names are to be put in the box, and when drawn out of the box there may be three-fourths of one party and one-fourth only of the panel of the opposite party.

The object of this bill is to prevent the law being perverted to partisan ends. I know of no instance in my State in which a republican has complained in a State court of the lack of a fair and impartial trial. On the contrary, wherever democrats have been tried in the courts presided over by democrats no discrimination has been made in the jury-box, whether men were republicans or democrats. I venture to affirm that this day one-half of the jurors serving in the State courts in Baltimore City are republicans. There is no discrimination there; but I do not say so much of the United States court. There the juries are nearly all to a man members of the republican party. In the last panel but three men in the whole panel could be found, I will not say who were identified with the democratic party, but who had affinities in consonance with the democratic party. They were not known democrats, nor active democrats, nor partisans in any sense, but had been found in the country somewhere where they professed to have democratic proclivities.

Mr. President, I have said a great deal more than I had intended to say, owing to the interruptions. I only desired to call attention to the law in my own State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Yesterday when the question was raised of conflict of the provisions of this bill with existing laws, I am safe in saying that it surprised most of the members of the committee by which this bill had been reported. Having heard the debate, I am not personally disposed to believe that there is any necessary conflict, or any conflict, between the act of 1875 which has been referred to and the provisions of the present bill. As has been stated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, it is the purpose of the committee to accomplish the one object professed by the bill. We did not intend that the present bill should be capable of any construction that would create a discrimination against any class of the citizens of the United States, nor do I believe with my present impressions that such a construction is a just or an allowable one. But nevertheless, holding this bill to be of great importance, holding it to be a bill which under the circumstances of its presentment, having been returned to the Senate from the Executive without those objections called for by the Constitution because it was accompanied by measures of a different nature, I desire that every opportunity should be given that not only should the bill include what is demanded but it should exclude any possible construction for other objects than those which are needed.

Therefore it is that I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that motion in order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves that the bill under consideration be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. And the Senator from New York inquires of the Chair whether that motion is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present incumbent of the chair holds that it is in order, but will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me understand the Chair. Am I right in supposing that this bill has been ordered to be three times read, that it has been read a third time, that a motion has been made to reconsider the vote ordering the third reading, and that motion to reconsider voted down? I inquire of the Chair whether the record shows the facts as I now state them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. And the Chair, if I may further understand him, rules in the presence of those facts that it is now in order to make and put to the Senate a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so holds, and will read the latter portion of the twenty-sixth rule:

> When a bill or resolution shall have been ordered to be read a third time, it shall not be in order to propose amendments, unless by unanimous consent, but it shall at all times be in order, before the final passage of any bill or resolution, to move its commitment; and when the bill or resolution shall again be reported from the committee, it shall be placed on the Calendar, and when again considered by the Senate, it shall be as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chair will submit the question to the Senate, if the Senator from New York is not satisfied with the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that it be submitted to the Senate, and I ask the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the ruling of the Chair shall stand that the motion of the Senator from Delaware to recommit the bill is in order. Upon that the Senator from New York asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Chair will indulge me I do not ask for anything on that question, for I do not conceive that the Chair has a right in any case to submit such a question as that. No appeal has been taken from the ruling of the Chair, and therefore the Chair must proceed, if at all, under that rule which enables him, instead of deciding a question himself, to submit it to the Senate, in which event the question to be submitted to the Senate is not whether the ruling of the Chair shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, but whether the motion proposed by the Senator from Delaware is in order. It makes a difference as the Chair will see, because in one case a smaller vote might prevail than would be necessary in another. It makes a difference of one vote whether the question is stated affirmatively, as the rule requires, or is stated in the way proposed by the Chair. Therefore I venture to draw the attention of the Chair to the rule which suggests the form in which the question shall be submitted, and I demand the yeas and nays upon it in whatever form the Chair chooses to submit it to the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the Chair to have decided the point of order, and therefore it is too late to submit it for consideration to the Senate. The Chair having decided the point of order, if there is no appeal from the decision of the Chair, then the question stands as decided and we proceed with the bill. If, however, at the time the question arises the Chair may be in doubt in relation to the correct decision of it, then he can submit it to the Senate, and the Senate will instruct the Presiding Officer. But whenever the Chair has decided, then it is too late most certainly for him to ask the Senate for instruction.

Mr. BLAINE. I believe the motion to commit leaves the general question of the bill still under consideration. Debate on the merits of the bill is not cut off by the interposition of a motion to commit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the present incumbent of the chair.

Mr. BLAINE. That such a motion does not limit debate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not cut off debate.

Mr. BLAINE. If that be the privilege, I was going to ask the honorable Senator from Maryland a question, whose remarks I did not hear continuously, but I heard enough of them to induce me to ask the question.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask to say a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not propose to debate this question at all, for I do not know that debate is in order. I merely want to have the rule read, after which I shall ask for the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. WHYTE. Rule 26.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Secretary to read Rule 26.

Mr. BLAINE. That has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A portion of that rule has just been read by the Chair. The Secretary will read it if the Senator from Delaware desires.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> 26. All bills and joint resolutions which shall have received two readings shall first be considered by the Senate in the same manner as if the Senate were in Committee of the Whole, after which they shall be reported to the Senate; and any amendments made in Committee of the Whole shall again be considered by the Senate, after which further amendments may be proposed. When a bill or resolution shall have been ordered to be read a third time, it shall not be in order to propose amendments, unless by unanimous consent, but it shall at all times be in order, before the final passage of any bill or resolution, to move its commitment; and when the bill or resolution shall again be reported from the committee, it shall be placed on the Calendar, and when again considered by the Senate it shall be as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Delaware upon which I may insist or may not insist on my objection. What is the purpose (or if I can make my meaning more definite by saying the object) of the motion to recommit? I suppose the Senator has no secret about it.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no secrets whatever in regard to the business of this body—none at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Then will the Senator tell me what is the purpose of recommitting this bill?

Mr. BAYARD. I will give the Senator as shortly as I may my reasons for the motion I have made. After the bill had been ordered to a third reading by the vote of the Senate, a defect was suggested by the honorable Senator from Vermont, (or that which he at least supposed to be a defect,) that certain acts of Congress were in conflict with the present bill which would be to a greater or less extent repealed if the pending bill became a law. After he had disclosed the character of his objection, the Senator from Ohio desired that unanimous consent should be given that such an amendment could be made to the bill as would place it beyond all doubt in the line of what the committee desired it to be and of what they believed it to be, and which nothing that occurred in their councils had led them to suppose it was not. But that unanimous consent, required by the rule which has just been read to the Senate, was refused, and the objection was made I believe by the Senator from Vermont or some other Senator upon the other side of the Chamber.

Therefore as I said to the Senate in rising to make the motion, my object was that as there had been complaint in the Senate, I believe upon the part of the Senator from Vermont, that time had not been given him for the full examination and criticism of this measure in committee, and that hence he was compelled to make his objection and criticism in the way that he saw fit to make them here, I supposed that the proper way, desiring this bill to become a law, desiring to remove all objections, which I will not stop to characterize, whether being in my opinion obstructive or sophistic, but desiring that the bill should fully meet all that it intends and not be subject to a construction to mean that which it did not intend, I took the only method known to me under the rules of the Senate to perfect the bill by moving that it be referred back to the committee.

I will say further that I was not individually much inclined to this motion; but it is my habit in acting in association, especially on matters connected with parliamentary law or with legislation, to accept and be governed by suggestions from those in whom I have confidence, although I may not entertain their views myself. I have but one object in regard to this measure, which is to see it substantially successful. I do not want any pretext, I do not want any pretense, of reason for objection to this bill to be urged. I do not want to waste public time in bandying words, or votes, or official action with any other department of the Government. For that reason I took the only method known to me, and the method which it is clear to me is allowable by our rules, which give the Senate the absolute control of a measure until it has passed out of its hands. Amendments have been refused at this stage of the bill to perfect it, for what reason I neither know nor care. It was the right of the party objecting to do so under the rule. It has been done, and therefore no amendment may be now made. But proposing that this question shall be examined and if necessary that such amendments should be made as shall exclude the conclusion which has been stated here in argument as being one to which this bill is liable, I have made the motion which the Chair has stated. I have no other reason than this. I had, as I thought, stated my reason once before, and thought the Senator from New York, being then present, might have heard it. This is, therefore, a mere repetition of my former statement.

Mr. CONKLING. I heard the Senator from Ohio, who has just resumed the chair, make the statement referred to by the Senator from Delaware. I did not understand that Senator to propose by unanimous consent to recommit the bill to the Judiciary Committee in order that a particular amendment might be added to it. That the Senator from Delaware says was his statement.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator please state that again? I did not hear him.

Mr. CONKLING. I say that listening, as I did, to the proposal earlier in the day made by the Senator from Ohio, I did not hear him state that his object was to add to the bill a particular amendment or indeed any amendment whatever. So far my recollection differs from that of the Senator from Delaware. That, however, is not very important. I hear the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] say in his seat "two amendments." I did not hear the Senator from Ohio refer to even one amendment, certainly not to two.

Mr. BECK. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not say that. I was stating to the Senator from Delaware that my recollection is that the Senator from Ohio desired to recommit the bill so that the bill should be open to amendment, not to any particular amendment, not for one, two, or three amendments, but open to amendment. That was what I desired to say to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not very important one way or the other.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to correct myself. A great deal of debate occurred between the Senator from New York and the Senator from Ohio, rapid speaking back and forth, and probably I did not hear all that was said.

Mr. CONKLING. I can only say for myself that now within a moment I have learned for the first time and learned from the Senator from Delaware the object in proposing to recommit the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator allow me to state the fact as he has asked me for my reasons? I said just now that unanimous consent was required after the bill had been ordered to a third reading by a vote of the Senate, for any amendment to be offered, and that such unanimous consent had not been given, understanding that the Senator from Vermont had made the objection. My memory is now that after the bill had been passed to a third reading by a vote of the Senate, a motion was made to reconsider that vote, and it was voted down, so that a second motion to reconsider was not in order. Then the suggestion was made that by unanimous consent a second motion to reconsider should be made and put. The object was then to open the bill to general amendment by bringing it to the stage at which it stood prior to being ordered to a third reading. That is all I meant to say as a question of fact. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator from New York further than to put myself right in regard to the fact as he seemed to desire to know what I said.

Mr. CONKLING. The long and short of this matter is that the Committee on the Judiciary, or more literally speaking, the democratic members of it, in pursuance of their own judgment or of the judgment of somebody else, or of the judgment of themselves associated with somebody else, brought in here a bill which I regard, without meaning offense to anybody, as not only unnecessary, but vicious in the extreme, pressed it in committee to a conclusion, brought it here and pressed it, so that last evening it was only after a struggle that we were permitted to adjourn, with a Senator on the floor, between five and six o'clock, wishing to address the Senate. It was only after a vote taken in the ordinary way, and then a vote taken by a division, and then a demand for the yeas and nays, that we were permitted to adjourn, so that the sun might go down before the consummation of this act of legislation. But during the night the democratic members of the Judiciary Committee, or somebody else who controls the doings and destinies of this body, has discovered that it will not do to pass this bill. Why not? We are told now for the first time by the Senator from Delaware; and what does he say? Because of a defect which we sought yesterday to remedy, and put our remedy in the very words and in the language of the distinguished Senator who now presides, in the very punctuation to be found already in the statutes; first, by including all of section 4 of the act of 1875, to the end that that section should not fall by reason of the date of this aftercoming enactment; that was voted down; then confining the provision to the national courts alone, so as to quiet the democratic constitutional conscience, and that was voted down. Now it turns out that at half after four of the next day these charioteers of legislation have concluded that it will not be safe to submit this bill to the executive approval.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or to the other House.

Mr. CONKLING. Or, as the Senator from Vermont says, even to the other House. What might occur in the other House I do not know; what might be done by the Executive I do not venture to say; but that the people of this country would place the seal of their condemnation upon an act so unnecessary, so vicious, and I feel authorized to add so indecent as this, I have no question whatever.

Now the Senator from Delaware by whom it was reported comes in and proposes to admit, as I understand him, not only that the bill is unjustifiable, not only that it ought not to pass the Senate, not only that it should not go to the House and should not be approved, but he proposes further that it is vicious and defective in the very particular which was pointed out on this side of the Chamber yesterday, the approved remedy for which we offered, as it stands now on the statute-book, being voted down by the vote of every democrat, including the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] who had pledged himself to vote for it.

If the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Ohio, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and the other leaders of the majority in this Chamber, along with those who follow, are willing to add to the Comedy of Errors which makes up this extra session of Congress the performance now proposed, (that is, that the authors and doers of this bill who have rejected all attempts made by the other side to improve it,) to take it back, to discard it, to repudiate and disavow it, I will withdraw the objection, if it was one, the request if it was so deemed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND,] who has now resumed the chair, that any question of order be submitted to the Senate; and for one, be it in order or out of order, be it within the twenty-sixth rule or within no rule, I consent that the motion of the honorable Senator from Delaware to recommit this product of statesmanship to the committee from which it came shall be put and entertained; and upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have in a somewhat long life seen a great many exhibitions of petty triumph; I have seen a great many exhibitions of contemptible triumph; but there is no occasion for any such exhibition to-day. This bill as it was reported by the Judiciary Committee is perfectly right, every word and every letter of it.

Mr. BLAINE, (in his seat.) Stand by it, then.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir, it is perfectly right, and it will not do for the Senator from Maine to call out irregularly from his seat, "stand by it." It is simply because there is something wrong in this Government that this bill does not become a law precisely as it is. When the men who have the charge of the Government in the legislative department, and who have a duty to perform, are compelled to pause by the fact that another department of the Government has a power to stop our legislation, and that therefore we are obliged to consult not simply what is right, but what is practicable, the Senator from New York gets up and wants to sneer at the Judiciary Committee and at the majority of the Senate. Sir, when the time shall come that I have to learn law from the Senator from New York, God forbid that I shall longer continue to practice the law. I will quit the courts when I have to learn law from him.

Mr. President, this bill is no idle piece of legislation. This bill is intended for serious legislation. This bill, which the Senator says is indecent, is the product of men quite as decent as he, and whose minds are quite as pure and quite as lofty as his. What is it that authorizes the Senator from New York to put on these airs in the Senate this afternoon? This measure was in the legislative appropriation bill, and it was vetoed. That bill was here nineteen days in the Senate, if my memory is correct, and was discussed. These very jury provisions were discussed on this side of the Chamber, at least, by almost every democratic Senator who spoke upon that bill, and not one single word of the objections that are now made, of the necessity for the amendments that are now suggested, did we hear from the other side of the Chamber. The bill was allowed to go to the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND.) Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator by any statement, but only to remind him that by an understanding of Senators who happened to be present at a particular moment some Senators on this side were cut off, yielding to Senators on the other side who were also cut out from saying a word upon that bill.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senators on the other side had not all the time they wanted to debate that question, then I must say that they require too much time for the average duration of human life. The greatest questions that ever agitate the British Parliament are generally determined in one single night's session. That bill was here nineteen days in this body with these provisions in it, and yet these gentlemen now say they had not time to find out what was the law of the land, and that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee ought to have found out and instructed the committee what was the law of the land. They had no time to find out what was the law of the land! They who made these laws, they who made them against all the opposition that I could bring to bear against them, they who forced them through by a partisan vote in this Senate—no, not a partisan vote, for there was at least one republican who would not subscribe to any such thing, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] and I do not know but that there were others. They complain that they have not had time to consider this matter, and that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee did not hunt up the law and tell them what the law was! Mr. President, everybody can see through this whole thing.

It is not at all for the purpose, so far as my own belief is concerned, of perfecting this bill that I am willing to have it recommitted; but we are earnest men in this business. We know that the jury laws as they now exist are used for partisan purposes. We know that as they are administered they are a disgrace to the so-called administration of justice. We are in dead earnest that that evil shall be remedied, even if it be necessary to suffer the mortification of the taunts of the Senator from New York. I hope we can survive plenty of that kind of medicine. Even if it be necessary to do that, we as practical men are willing to see that mere sophistry at this end of the Avenue shall not be re-echoed from the other end of the Avenue. That is all there is of it. If the Senator from New York thinks that God has crowned him with such surpassing intellect, and that the study of the law has made him the very embodiment of the code of Justinian, Coke's Institutes, all the English statutes, and the American statutes too, that he has breakfasted on Blackstone's Commentaries, taken lunch on Kent, dined on Story, and taken as a slight refection before he retired to bed John Marshall's decisions, let him live in that happy atmosphere of self-esteem; I will not attempt in the slightest degree to mar one single particle of his self-satisfaction. I even agree that he may loom over me, a much older lawyer than he is, like one of those genii in the Arabian Nights, who when the cork was taken out of the bottle rose out, away up to the clouds, to the utter amazement and astonishment of all beholders. Let it be so as long as he pleases, but he shall not prevent me as a practical legislator from attempting to remove the pebbles that he throws in my path when I have a march to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from New York had called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. A few moments ago I desired to ask the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] a question for information, whether on the political trials, as he designated them, in Maryland, under the election laws, of the jury that convicted it is not a fact that at least five of the twelve were democrats?

Mr. WHYTE. I answer with great promptness that it is anything but the fact. There is not a particle of truth in it if anybody has so asserted it.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the Senator to say that all twelve were republicans?

Mr. WHYTE. There were but three democrats on the entire panel, and if any jury at all had any democrats on it they certainly did not exceed more than one, and he of a very doubtful character.

Mr. BLAINE. Of a doubtful character personally, or of a doubtful character as a democrat?

Mr. WHYTE. As a democrat, and consequently of a doubtful character otherwise, too.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator mean by that that if he is a doubtful character as a democrat he is necessarily a doubtful character as a man?

Mr. WHYTE. Not necessarily, but in this case it happened to be so.

Mr. BLAINE. A sort of cause and consequence. I wanted to ask in that connection whether or not the part of the bill on which I made a brief inquiry yesterday would not lead to some trouble, in the judgment of the honorable Senator from Maryland, for whose legal opinion I have great respect? Because if this man was a doubtful democrat, and put on as a doubtful one, how would the Senator construe the provision, of which I believe the honorable Senator from Ohio is proud of the paternity, that one of the commissioners to select jurymen for Federal courts is to be "of good standing and a well-known member of the opposite political party?" He is not to be a doubtful democrat; he is to be a regular double-and-twisted, strong-fisted ward bummer, a fellow that is around in party caucuses and conclaves. Is that what the Senator would construe as the requirements of this new provision? The man who got on the jury in Baltimore, according to the honorable Senator, would not fill the requirements of this bill of the Senator from Ohio, for he is to be "a well-known member" of the opposite party, and "of good standing."

There is one other point on which I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Maryland a question in good faith; though I should prefer to address it to the honorable Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, if his equanimity has been sufficiently restored to permit the question to be addressed to him. I ask whether or not the jury would be vitiated in a contingency I shall name. In the case of an indictment by a grand jury and afterward the question is raised as to whether the grand jury that found the bill was properly constituted, because drawn by a commissioner who on good and competent testimony was subsequently shown to be not "a man of good standing and a well-known member of the opposite party?" I ask the honorable Senator from Maryland (I despair of an answer from the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee) would that vitiate the jury?

Mr. WHYTE. I did not hear the question.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask, should the law direct that the jury shall be drawn by "a commissioner of good standing and a well-known member of the opposite party," and it should turn out that instead of being such a character he was merely a doubtful democrat, would that vitiate the jury?

Mr. WHYTE. I take it for granted it would not. It depends entirely. After the appointment is made we have to take the chances of getting respectable juries.

Mr. BLAINE. That would not vitiate the jury, the Senator from Maryland thinks?

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly not. He may be a republican and give us the same republican juries under this proposed law.

Mr. BLAINE. You might, then, draw a republican jury under this provision. If a commissioner would agree to serve under a sort of collusive cheat with the clerk of the court you might still get it all republican, and there would be no effect in the provision.

Mr. WHYTE. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Then it does not seem to me that the proposed law is going to have much bite to it.

Mr. WHYTE. Then the Senator ought not to object to it.

Mr. BLAINE. I object to any form of cheating in drawing a jury. It seems to me this is getting elaborately ready for an enormous cheat all around. I merely wanted to know as the legal construction upon the part of the Judiciary Committee whether that would in the end vitiate the jury.

There is one feature of this debate that is rather pleasing to me, aside from that which has been well commented upon by others. It is a very handsome disguise I admit, but still it is a retreat. What light has dawned on the Senator from Ohio that enables him to say just now that the bill has got to be changed to avoid an executive veto? What has thrown new light upon any provision of the bill or upon his mind? What particular connection does he have with or what advice does he get from the other end of the Avenue to tell him that unless this bill is changed it will meet with executive disapproval?

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have no information from the other end of the Avenue. If I had and if I should state it to the Senate, it would be a violation of one of the plainest rules.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator has already violated that rule.

Mr. THURMAN. Not the least bit of it; I have only speculated.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator has stated that this bill ought to be changed to avoid the objections which it would encounter at the other end of the Avenue; not in those words, but tantamount to that.

Mr. THURMAN. No, which it might encounter. If the Senator had not interrupted me a moment ago before I answered his question, he would have had the answer before this time.

Mr. President, I did not say that I had any knowledge from the other end of the Avenue. If I had done so, I should have been violating the privileges of the Senate and a plain parliamentary law. I only spoke of my own inferences, and those inferences were simply founded on the fact that in my opinion bills have been vetoed, notably the Army bill, because the members of the republican party in both Houses of Congress, by no means very friendly to the incumbent of the presidential chair, have—I will not use the slang language of the day, I will not talk about bulldozing—but have coerced the Executive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator has got well out of it——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine will suspend. The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I say that the Senator from Ohio is out of order in using the language he has. I ask the words to be taken down and I ask the Senate to decide it.

Mr. BLAINE. Why should that be done? What will we do after the words are taken down?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We shall have another decision of the Senate, like some others which have been made perhaps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will come to order. The Reporter will read the words of the Senator from Ohio to which the Senator from Vermont has objected.

The Reporter read from his short-hand notes of Mr. THURMAN'S remarks, as follows:

> And those inferences were simply founded on the fact that in my opinion bills have been vetoed, notably the Army bill, because the members of the republican party in both Houses of Congress, by no means very friendly to the incumbent of the presidential chair, have—I will not use the slang language of the day, I will not talk about bulldozing—but have coerced the Executive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the question of order raised by the Senator from Vermont, which will be submitted to the Senate. The Senator from Vermont will indicate the particular words to which he excepts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I indicate the whole of that passage taken together, as imputing to the President of the United States unconstitutional and improper conduct, and also to the members of this House; I cannot say as to the other.

Mr. BECK. Why are the words out of order? Let us have that explained.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir; under what rule is it that a reference to the President of the United States in terms like that and ten times worse should be out of order? I should like to know the rule. It seems to me to be very true that we are already getting to a point where we are not permitted to legislate without consulting the President to know what we are to put in our bills, but certainly it is carrying it a step further if we are to be denied the privilege of a reference to him without being called to order. I want to know the rule under which that is done.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Alabama will permit me to answer there——

Mr. BECK. I have the floor, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the question being submitted to the Senate by the Chair debate is in order.

Mr. BECK. I rose to make the inquiry which has been made by the Senator from Alabama. I desired to know why those words were out of order, and to have the ground stated before we are called upon to vote. If the truth is out of order in the Senate, then those words are out of order.

Mr. BLAINE. I was about to answer the Senator from Alabama, and now I will answer both him and the Senator from Kentucky together. I was referring to a statement——

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course.

Mr. HOUSTON. My call on the Chair as to the question of order was for the rule under which that language was taken down and under which the point of order was made. I am not appealing to the Senator from Maine. He is not in this little controversy now; he did not make the point of order. I desire the Senator from Vermont to state under what rule this proceeding is taking place.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Maine was just getting in it at the time the Senator from Alabama interrupted him.

Mr. HOUSTON. And it seems to be very common for him to get himself in all places where he proposes to save one of his friends from trouble.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Maine will be the judge of the controversies he will put himself in and will not ask for instruction from the Senator from Alabama on that point.

I was remarking to the Senator from Ohio, that he had given us one of the reasons either by direction or indirection of the back down and back out on this bill that it would encounter danger elsewhere. Then the Senator with some parade of propriety stated that he knew too well to impute anything of that sort to the Executive, and then proceeded to enlighten the Senate with the further information that he did expect a veto on this measure, because the President had been coerced on a bill just the same, or in similar cases, before. That was what we would call an Irish apology. Instead of making the charge by indirection, or insinuation, or implication, I understand the Senator from Ohio now to say that a veto is to be expected on this measure because the Executive has been—he said he would not use the word "bulldoze," that is a tender word with democrats—but coerced by republicans on this side who are not friendly to him. That is what I understand the honorable Senator from Ohio to say now.

Whether it is out of order or whether it is in order I do not care, I should not have made the point of order on it. It is, however, plainly out of order. The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Alabama want to know the reasons why it is out of order. It is out of order because it reflects on the motives and conduct of Senators on this side of the Chamber. If not out of order because of disrespect to the Executive it is out of order in that regard. It is out of order in that it imputes motives and censures the conduct both of the opposite side of the Chamber here and of the great co-ordinate department elsewhere. That is my answer, although I repeat that I should not have raised the point of order.

Mr. THURMAN. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not propose to be condemned without a small hearing, even if it be very short. If I am not mistaken——

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. THURMAN. I understood that the question of order was submitted to the Senate, and therefore that it is open to discussion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir, but the Senator from Ohio is on trial, and being on trial he has no business to speak except by unanimous consent, which I cheerfully give, for one.

Mr. THURMAN. That is just about as good as the point of order. They are exactly of the same stuff.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is perfectly good too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont raise another question of order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir, I have no objection to the Senator from Ohio proceeding, but he has no right to do it.

Mr. THURMAN. No right!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont does not raise a question of order, the Chair understands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know the rule of order which prohibits me from being heard.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator, of course, has no right to proceed after the words are taken down until the Senate either vindicates him or the reverse.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us understand one moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will suspend for a moment. The Chair understands that no question is raised against the Senator from Ohio proceeding.

Mr. THURMAN. The words that I spoke were spoken and I had taken my seat before the question of order was raised. There is no necessity for me to ask leave to proceed in order, or for any friend of mine to ask leave to proceed in order. What this question is raised for, or what good is to come out of it, I really do not know, unless the Senator from Vermont proposes to move a resolution of censure upon me——

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I venture to rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not ask him to yield. Cannot I rise to a question of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Chair will have read the thirty-sixth rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the rule.

Mr. CONKLING. I am sorry this point of order was raised at all; I do not sympathize with it; but notwithstanding we may as well observe the plainly printed rules of the Senate, and I ask that rule 36 be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

If any Senator, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the Senate, the presiding officer shall, or any Senator may, call him to order; and when a Senator shall be so called to order he shall sit down, and shall not proceed without leave of the Senate, which leave, if granted, shall be upon motion that he be allowed to proceed in order; which motion shall then be in order and be determined without debate.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, Mr. President, I withdraw my point of order. I made it because the Senator with some emphasis said he would like to know what rule it was that declared that when a Senator was called to order he had not a right himself to proceed without a vote of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. I had sat down before the question was raised.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Senator from Ohio had taken his seat and the Senator from Maine was on the floor making a speech when the Senator from Vermont interposed his question of order.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, Mr. President, if I understand it aright, the supposition is that this rule does not apply because the Senator from Ohio uttered the words for which he was called to order in the time of another Senator and not when he held the floor in his own right.

Mr. BECK and others. No, no.

Mr. CONKLING. That is an amusing distinction, to be sure.

Mr. BECK. Nobody made it.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Maine was on the floor; the Senator from Ohio with his assent rose to say something, and that something in the estimation of the Senator from Vermont was a violation of the rules of the Senate. Thereupon he called him to order and demanded that the words should be taken down and read at the desk, as they were. The Chair said he would submit the question of order to the Senate, and pending that the Senator from Ohio proceeds, and he, or somebody for him, demands to know what rule it is that says he shall not proceed until he is exonerated by the Senate. The rule has been read; and now the suggestion is made that because he uttered the words during the time that another Senator held the floor and not while he had it in his own right, therefore the rule does not apply. Well, I think it is of a piece with the general proceeding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will pardon the Chair for a moment. When the Senator from Ohio attempted to proceed after the question of order was made the Chair understood the Senator from Vermont to raise a question of order upon him, which he almost immediately withdrew. There being no further objection, the Chair considered that the Senator from Ohio had a right to proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair did perfectly right.

Mr. CONKLING. That I submit, if I may be allowed, was quite right in the Chair; but after that the Senator from Ohio demanded to know what rule it was that required general consent that he should proceed, and therefore I asked that the rule be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish merely to make a statement, not to interfere with my friend from Ohio to whom speaking I have not the slightest objection, although I think it is against the rule. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is mistaken, with great respect to him, in that I did not make my point of order in time, (that is what it amounts to,) because he understands the sentence was concluded that made the imputation that I thought it did of improper conduct in the President and improper conduct in Senators on this floor. I instantly rose, and said to the Chair that I rose to a point of order. I stopped the Senator from Maine who was trying to speak at the same time and asked that the words be taken down, and the Chair recognized me for that purpose. If that was not due diligence, I do not understand what is.

Mr. WHYTE. May I ask the Senator from Vermont whether the use of the word "coercion" in regard to either a member of the Senate or the President is the offense of which the Senator from Ohio has been guilty, because we have been charged with coercing the President in our action every day, and nobody has objected to it on this side?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is one thing to say that Senators by a course of legislation do what in effect is the coercion of the President, and it is another thing to say that Senators on either side of the Chamber, any member of this body, be it one or many, have coerced or intended to coerce the President of the United States, because they in doing that would be guilty of a high political crime, in my opinion, and the President would be guilty of an equally wicked crime if he suffered himself to be coerced by anybody. In other words, it is imputing to the President of the United States, which I understand to be contrary to parliamentary law, the commission of a grave offense, for which he ought to be impeached if he were guilty of it, and it is imputing to Senators on this floor (who until this session were supposed to have equal rights all around) improper, wicked motives that ought to subject them to expulsion in undertaking to influence the President of the United States either to sign or not to sign a bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, have I a right to speak? I want to know whether I am in the dock or whether I have a right to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair decides that the Senator from Ohio in the absence of any objection can proceed under the thirty-sixth rule.

Mr. THURMAN. I shall maintain, in the presence of all the objections that have been made, that I have a right to proceed.

Mr. CONKLING. Then some objection ought to be made, I think.

Mr. THURMAN. Go on; raise another point of order. What are the facts? The Senator from Maine saw fit to ask me a question. I replied to it. I had uttered my last sentence and was already in my seat or as near to it as I could possibly be, for I undertook to be seated as soon as I uttered that sentence, when the Senator from Vermont rose and said that my words were out of order. I was not asking the Senate to hear me further; I did not want any friend of mine to ask that I might proceed in order. I had said all that I intended to say, every word that I intended to say, and had resumed my seat. At the same instant that I resumed my seat the Senator from Vermont rose and said that the words I had uttered were out of order. I do not know for what purpose he called attention to them and said they were out of order, unless it was to follow it up with some motion. It was not to prevent me from further speaking, for I had ceased to speak. It was not to require me to proceed in order, for I did not want to proceed at all; I had said all that I intended to say. Unless, then, he wanted to establish that the Senator from Ohio was disorderly and put it on the records of the Senate that he was disorderly, or unless he intended to visit me with some punishment, such as the censure of the Senate for being out of order, I do not know why he made the point at all. If he thought that the words were such that they ought to be rebuked by the Senate as a warning to all other speakers hereafter in all time to come; if he who was a Senator here during the administration of Andrew Johnson as President of the United States, and who was treated with scant respect by his opponents on this floor and on the floor of the other House, thought that it was material for the purposes of public decency and the orderly proceeding of the Senate that he should have the judgment of the Senate upon this extraordinary violation of its usages and of parliamentary law by me, very well, so be it; but when the question is submitted to the Senate whether I was out of order or not, then I claim that I have a right to be heard.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what it is. I ask that the words may be read again. Let the Reporter read them.

The words were again read by the Reporter, as follows:

> And those inferences were simply founded on the fact that in my opinion bills have been vetoed, notably the Army bill, because the members of the republican party in both Houses of Congress, by no means very friendly to the incumbent of the presidential chair, have—I will not use the slang language of the day, I will not talk about bulldozing—but have coerced the Executive.

Now, sir, what does that mean? It is not long since that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] said that it was the belief of every Senator on the opposite side of the Chamber that there were no less than twelve Senators on this side of the Chamber who held their places by force and fraud; and when he was called to order for that I, being in the chair, decided that he was not out of order, because he had not imputed that force and fraud to the Senators themselves.

I said that bills have been vetoed because in my opinion the President has been coerced. Coerced how? By duress, which I need not tell the Senator from Vermont means personal violence? No, sir, nobody understood me so. Coerced how? Coerced because in my judgment, and I am willing to go to my death upon it, the Senator from Vermont and the representatives in this Chamber on the republican side by the course they took on those bills, by leaving the merits of the subject, by raising the flag of the revolution, by waving the bloody shirt, by talking about this being a question between secession and the Union, and by the whole course they pursued upon that subject, made a man (I will not say a weak man, for I mean to be respectful to the Executive) veto the bills which if left to his own judgment he would not have vetoed at all. And therefore I say that your course did coerce him. I say that if you had argued those bills upon their merits, if you had said nothing upon them but what was their merits, if you had not made this whole session ring with an attempt to arouse sectionalism in the North against the people of the South, if this whole session on your side had not been to a great extent an effort to perpetuate bad blood between the sections, you never would have had any veto of these bills.

If I was out of order before, perhaps I am more out of order now, but I will die in that belief.

Now, one word more. Of all men in this Senate, the Senator from Vermont is, I think, the last man who should have made this point against me. Sir, he is much more given to looking into the journals of Congress than I am, but I do sometimes look into the journals of Congress, and I remember that on one occasion the late Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Sumner) denounced Andrew Johnson on this floor, Andrew Johnson then being President of the United States, as an enemy of his country, and I remember that on the question whether that Senator was out of order in accusing the President of the United States of being an enemy of his country, the Senator from Vermont voted that he was not out of order. He is one of the last men that I should have thought would have called me to order on such a point as he has made. And, sir, if I am not mistaken, the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] when presiding over the other House of Congress, decided that a member was not out of order for using accusatory words of the President of the United States, and that not on a question whether the President should be impeached or not; and yet——

Mr. BLAINE. Where did the Senator get that information?

Mr. THURMAN. I will hunt it up for the Senator if he wants it.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the direct question, where did the honorable Senator get that information?

Mr. THURMAN. I can inform the Senator—from the Senator himself.

Mr. BLAINE. That is what I wanted the Senator to say.

Mr. THURMAN. I got it from the Senator himself. I think the decision was entirely wrong, and if he will make use of such accusatory words of the President of the United States now, although he is not a democratic Senator, and I am in the chair, I will call him to order.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. I wanted the answer for the very reason that it was a conversation between the Senator and myself, and therefore I wanted to use the other side of it. I did hold that, and I held also, as was shown by Andrew Jackson in his famous communication to the Senate of the United States, that there is a difference on this floor touching the Executive and on the floor of the other House.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not propose to argue that question.

Mr. BLAINE. But I do. That is my side of it. The honorable Senator has stated his. I agreed with him. I agreed that by the history of the country it is not permitted to the branch that has the power to try an impeachment to speak of the Executive as it is left to the Representatives of the people, who only have the power to present him, to impeach him. Sir, one of the most eminent men——

Mr. THURMAN. I do not yield further. The Senator has made his explanation, and now I believe I will go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. THURMAN. No; it is not for the Senator from Maine to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thought the Senator from Ohio had given up the floor and recognized the Senator from Maine.

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; I only gave way.

Mr. BLAINE. One word and I will yield to the honorable Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not want you to yield to me at all.

Mr. BLAINE. I was going to illustrate it in this way: One of the most eminent Senators who, on the impeachment of Andrew Johnson voted for his acquittal, told me that he would, if he had been a member of the House, have voted for his presentment; he would have impeached him. Here he voted for his acquittal; and that involved the very difference between the two Houses. There was ground enough to impeach; there was not enough to convict. There is a freedom of debate where the responsibility of conviction does not lie that will not attach to this body; and that was shown, and shown conclusively, in the communication that Andrew Jackson sent to the Senate of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, one word. First, in regard to the remark of the Senator from Maine that the information he furnished me was in a conversation. It was in no sense a private conversation.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course not, or I would not have used it.

Mr. THURMAN. Therefore, as he required of me to tell how I got my information, I gave it to him. And now one word as to what the Senator says as to the distinction between the two Houses. There is a line that it is very difficult to draw in the Senate between what may be said by a Senator of the Chief Magistrate of the country and what may not; but one thing is certain, that the privilege of a Senator in regard to matters which do not constitute cause for impeachment is certainly as broad as the privilege of any member of the House of Representatives; and in nothing that I said did I allude to anything which would be a cause for impeaching the President of the United States. So the distinction of the Senator will not obtain at all.

Mr. President, I have occupied more time on this business than I intended to do. I am perfectly willing that this question shall be taken. It will help me a little, as long as a majority of the Senate see fit to make me the locum tenens of the Vice-President's chair, to know what is in order and what is not in order. If it is out of order to allude to the result of a course pursued by one side of the Chamber in this body, to speak of the effect produced by the course pursued by one party on the President or on the country, let the Senate so decide; let them decide that it is the business of the Chair, for, if it was the business of the Senator from Vermont it was your business, sir, to call me to order—let them decide that the presiding officer of this Senate when he thinks a Senator is making a speech that imputes to a course that is pursued some effect, is to call that Senator to order; in other words, let the Senate decide that its presiding officer, unless overruled by the Senate, has a right to limit debate in this Chamber, and I will submit as well as I can until I can get that decision reversed, and not one second longer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio has endeavored to fortify his defense by saying that I have been equally, or more guilty, on some previous occasion in some other Congress. I do not think that would prove very conclusively that this point of order is not well taken. If every Senator who raises a question of order for some violation of the proprieties of the Senate, is to have that question determined upon his personal conduct on some previous occasion, then there will be little use in raising questions of order. I do not think that is a very good argument.

But another fault in that argument is that the Senator is entirely, grossly mistaken in what he has stated as to my conduct on the occasion to which he has alluded. When Mr. Sumner used words like those the Senator from Ohio has stated, and I dare say exactly—I do not mean to say that he has misquoted them; I do not remember the exact words, but something in substance of that kind,—some Senator on this floor called Mr. Sumner to order. It was late in the day, and there was a dispute (the words being taken down) as to whether those words were in order or not. If the Senator will look at the Congressional Globe of that time I think he will find that the Senator from Vermont, whom he quotes as an example of voting that that was in order, stated that, in his opinion, the Senator from Massachusetts was out of order, but that, as the question had been suddenly presented, he wished that it might go over until the next day; and, thereupon, the question of order was laid on the table, which, by our rules, does not kill it, as it does in the House of Representatives, but it may be taken up at any time by parliamentary law. It was laid upon the table; for which motion I voted with the explicit statement that, in my opinion, the Senator from Massachusetts was out of order; but that was a hasty opinion formed upon the spur of the moment; reflection has taught me to believe that it is clear he was out of order.

The Senator from Ohio ought to know me well enough to know that it was not out of any personal disrespect to him that I made this question of order; but it was in the hope that we might, in the deliberations of this Chamber, always keep strictly within the line of propriety, not imputing to each other, or to a co-ordinate branch of the Government with whom we are in, by the Constitution, such intimate relations, improper motives and improper conduct in the sense of which I now speak.

The Senator from Ohio has now stated that what he intended, what he meant by that, was that the consequence of the debates in this Chamber was that the President of the United States did not approve of a certain bill. In other words——

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will state his point of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. It is that there is no point of order before the Senate that the Senator from Vermont is discussing. The Presiding Officer has ruled that the point of order made by the Senator from Vermont against the Senator from Ohio was withdrawn, and yet it has lingered along in this shambling way and it comes up now——

Mr. CONKLING. How withdrawn?

Mr. VOORHEES. I heard it withdrawn, and heard it so stated by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Indiana that he is mistaken. The point of order withdrawn by the Senator from Vermont was as to the right of the Senator from Ohio to proceed to discuss the question before the Senate. The original point of order that the Senator from Vermont made is now pending before the Senate; that is as to the words objected to, which were read by the Reporter.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then the point of order the Senator from Vermont is discussing is that it is out of order to say that somebody has attempted to or has coerced the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe I have the floor now. Then I think I will take it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. He declines to yield, and that it is his right to do.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir; and I will remember his courtesy hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Indiana will never forget any of the good things I do to him.

Mr. VOORHEES. I never will.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not, because he has always my kindest wishes, and he will always have my best support and admiration, for he deserves it; and I speak it in all sincerity. Now, Mr. President, I will conclude what I was going on to say.

The Senator from Ohio ought to know me well enough—and I am sure he does when he thinks a minute—to know that I did not make this point of order for the purpose of making any point upon him; far from it; but only, as I said, that we might call the attention of the Senate to this line of debate and keep ourselves strictly within the limits of those proprieties that we all agree in general ought to be observed. I thought the Senator from Ohio, I was clear that the Senator from Ohio, in the sense in which I understood his words, sincerely, was plainly out of order. The Senator from Ohio has explained what he meant, and that was that, as a consequence of debates in this body, putting forth reasons that he thinks were not good reasons, the President of the United States in looking over the ground was convinced that a certain bill ought not to be approved. In that sense, of course, the Senator from Ohio would not be out of order. He had a perfect right to say that. The coercion of argument is not the sort of coercion that I understood him to mean. As he says he meant that, I have no point of order to make, and I withdraw the point I did make.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose I now have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. BLAINE. Have I not the floor, the point of order being withdrawn?

Mr. EATON. It cannot be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from Maine yield the floor to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BLAINE. He took me off it by the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will then recognize the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. I was taken off the floor and am now entitled to it. Hereafter when a Senator has the floor at about the hour of five o'clock, or a quarter before it, and thinks he has got a good speech to make, which the Senate will listen to for twenty-five or thirty minutes with reasonable patience, and he is jammed into a little controversy of this kind and postponed until the dinner hour is impending and nobody has a particle of patience to listen to him, I hope it will be out of order to make any Senator the victim of such a conspiracy as I have suffered from.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Maine before he takes his seat designate whom he means by that?

Mr. BLAINE. I mean the Senator from Vermont. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EATON. Another motion is before the Senate, or else I very much mistake the business of the Senate. A Senator has been called to order, and that question was given to the Senate to decide upon it, and upon that arose a certain discussion. Now I ask for a vote upon that question whether that Senator was in order or out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Vermont to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. EATON. In my judgment it is not in the power of the Senator from Vermont to withdraw a point of order which has been submitted to the Senate by the Presiding Officer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will hear me a moment——

Mr. EATON. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rules of the Senate and parliamentary law allow any motion or resolution or anything a Senator submits to be withdrawn until it has been amended or the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it. Neither event had occurred; and after the explanation of the Senator from Ohio as to what he meant, I was perfectly satisfied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the understanding of the Chair; but the Chair will submit that question to the Senate. ["No!" "No!"] The Senate does not wish it submitted. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope this bill will not be recommitted. I hope every Senator on this side will vote against its recommittal. I hope it will be voted for as it stands now; and if the Judiciary Committee have not brought here a bill fit to be passed, I trust that hereafter they may have an opportunity to report something in the way of amendment.

Mr. BECK. I do not like to vote against the motion made by the Judiciary Committee; but it seems to me that when we have before us a bill, whose purpose is to annul a law that was fraudulently inserted into the Revised Statutes, we can act on it directly. I use the word "fraudulently" on purpose, because it was done fraudulently. The man who put it there, whoever he was, knew when he inserted section 820 that it was a repealed law, and there was no possibility of his not knowing it, and any man who reads the statutes is obliged to see it. And when we seek to repeal with that another section, which is simply a corollary of the first, because, even if a man cannot take the oath prescribed in section 821, the prohibition to sit as a juror in section 820 cannot exclude him, and as that repealing measure was before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate during all the last Congress on a bill that I introduced myself, and as opposition is coming to it in every form, I hope that we shall send it to the House. When it is there before the Judiciary Committee of that body, if any amendment is necessary to which the attention of our committee was not called, and which was withheld from them by gentlemen on the other side, or from any other cause was overlooked, it can be corrected there, and we shall get clear of the difficulty we have been laboring under so long.

Just here I desire to say before I vote that when so much objection was made to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio, I could not help turning to a very remarkable speech made by a former Senator from Ohio, Mr. Wade, in the days of Andrew Johnson, which made him, the presiding officer of this Senate and installed him in the seat now temporarily occupied by yourself, Mr. President, for the purpose of making him President of the United States when Andrew Johnson should be successfully impeached, as they thought he would be then; because he did make the speech and it had more to do with it than all else that was said, and the republican party sustained him, not only in the speech that he made, but sustained him by making him their presiding officer and by an earnest effort to make him the President of the United States because of it. This is the language he used then:

> Sir, we cannot abandon it unless we yield to a principle that will unhinge and unsettle the balances of the Constitution itself. If the President of the United States can interpose his authority upon a question of this character, and can compel Congress to succumb to his dictation, he is an emperor, a despot, and not a President of the United States—
>
> He had vetoed a bill of theirs, which veto they did not like—
>
> Because I believe the great question of congressional power and authority is at stake here, I yield to no importunities of the other side. I feel myself justified in taking every advantage which the Almighty has put into my hands to defend the power and authority of this body, of which I claim to be a part; I will not yield to these appeals of comity on a question like this; but I will tell the President and everybody else—
>
> A Senator had been taken sick and could not appear, and the minority were begging for time—> that if God Almighty has stricken one member so that he cannot be here to uphold the dictation of a despot, I thank Him for His interposition, and I will take advantage of it if I can.

And there was great applause in the galleries. Mr. Wade, of Ohio, made that speech, was sustained in it by the republicans, and was elected the president of this body for the purpose of making him President of the United States because he did make it; and yet the present Senator from Ohio is to be called to order for the remark that he made just now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Mr. President, I sincerely hope that this bill will be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I am greatly surprised that there is any opposition to it. The only object can be to perfect the bill and make it better. That is all. I advised the Senator from Ohio this morning early, when I first saw him this morning after I had read the debate of yesterday—I was not here yesterday—that I thought the bill could be improved. If I had been here yesterday I should have voted for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. The point did not occur to me when the bill was before the Committee on the Judiciary; nor do I think such an amendment absolutely necessary, but it is to exclude a conclusion, it is out of abundance of caution, and the bill should be perfected here. We should not let it go to the House to be perfected there and then come back here for us to act on their amendment. I am in favor of repealing both the eight hundred and twentieth and eight hundred and twenty-first sections of the Revised Statutes on principle. I want to get a good jury law; I am not wedded to anything in particular, but I want to get the best that I can; and it does seem to me that when the gentleman from the Judiciary Committee who reported this bill gets up here and asks that the privilege be accorded of recommitting it to the Committee on the Judiciary in order to perfect it, it ought to be done, and that it is factious to oppose it.

Mr. BECK. I deny the suggestion of its being factious to oppose it. It is a bill that goes to the House, and the Judiciary Committee of the House can receive any suggestion made by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate as to any modification that ought to be made, and it is more factious to keep it here day after day and week after week than it is to perfect it, even if it is not absolutely perfect, and send it to the House where it can be made perfect.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. In reply to the Senator from Kentucky, I would ask when gentlemen on the Judiciary Committee say that the bill can be improved, is it in good faith or good taste to send it over to the House to have them do the thing that we ought to do here? I submit that it is not, sir. It is neither in good taste nor good faith.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I am prepared myself to vote for the bill in its present shape, and for the reason that I have no belief in the truth of the argument, or in the virtue of the argument, that has been made by the gentlemen on the opposite side of this Chamber; yet the Judiciary Committee ask that the bill be recommitted. I say what I have said to justify the votes which I have given in the preliminary stages of this measure; but in view of the fact that the committee desire the bill to be returned, I do hope our friends will vote to recommit it. Let it go back to the committee that had charge of it and that understand it, and let them examine the whole question. They certainly understand it now better than the committee of the House will do without a good deal of labor; and I do hope our friends here will recommit the bill and terminate this controversy.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, it so happens that the Committee on the Judiciary instructed me to report this bill to the Senate, and I have done so, and have made to the Senate such statement as I saw fit by way of explanation and advocacy of its passage. In the course of debate some questions have arisen which put in doubt the construction to which the bill may be subjected; and the question only is whether that examination and possible amendment which criticism may suggest shall be made by the Committee on the Judiciary, (for it cannot now be made in the Senate under our rules) or whether it shall pass in a doubtful state to the House of Representatives to seek its amendment there.

To me there is but one object in this whole business, and that simply is the public service. I do not think there are laurels to be gained here by disrespect shown to any member of the Senate, and it is cheap business any way to do so, because every man knows there is no very satisfactory means by which they can be settled. I never have since I came here, and I do not propose at any time, voluntarily to indulge in innuendo or personality of any kind. My object is to perform my duty very simply and clearly in such a manner as shall leave my own self-respect and entitle me to the respect of decent men. The respect of others I do not care for nor want.

In this case it is a simple question whether or not we desire this bill to become a law. Every precaution that will tend in that direction I seek to secure. For that reason, following the suggestion of several of my colleagues on the committee, the honorable Senator from Illinois who last spoke, and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and yourself, sir, among others, [Mr. GARLAND in the chair,] I have yielded an opinion of my own, rather adverse at first, and desire that this bill shall be recommitted. There is no other view that I take than the perfection of the measure. There is no suggestion as to what the motive may be, the valor or the want of it in sending this bill at any time to the committee. Such things are scarcely worthy of consideration, and with me they weigh not a feather. Whatever I shall consider it my duty to do, I trust I shall be furnished with enough fortitude to do. Therefore it is that I shall vote for the commitment of this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I wish to say only a word. This whole predicament is very painful to me. The want of unity which dwells on the other side of the Chamber is distressing, and with all the symptoms of a somewhat ruffled temper which I discover on the other side my honorable friend from Ohio is amiable,—yesterday and to-day. I think it has been owing in large part to the sweetness of his nature, and the tranquil and placid frame of mind which, for some reason, he has been in that we have been able to proceed as smoothly and successfully as we have done. But even that has not avoided divisions, I see, among the members constituting the majority of this Chamber. I am pained to hear the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] refuse to assent to this motion made by the manager of this bill.

All this tends with me to get up a confusion; and added to it is another difficulty, what the effect is to be now of recommitting this bill to the committee. Assuming for the purpose of the question that that motion is in order, what power that is to give the Judiciary Committee over the bill, how the Judiciary Committee is to amend or to acquire the power to amend it, to add to it, or to strike out, are questions which at this moment, in a proceeding so novel and extraordinary, I do not venture for myself to decide; but as the scepter of the Senate belongs to the other side, as the other side has a majority and a quorum, and as this whole proceeding from beginning to end is to me so novel, so extraordinary, so unlike any other which has fallen within my limited experience, I shall venture for one to withhold my vote, not further to ensnarl myself, but to leave, so far as I am concerned, to those who constitute the majority and a quorum of the Senate to give direction to the subsequent steps in this devious and new proceeding. I do not wish to avoid any responsibility, or to dodge, as it is said, a vote; but I do not wish to involve myself unnecessarily in contradictions by voting to commit this bill to a committee which I think will have very little power over it after it gets there; nor, on the other hand, will I interpose against the willingness to retract and withdraw and admit an error which the other side seem anxious to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to recommit the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when the name of Mr. HOAR was called.) My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.]

Mr. WHYTE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] I do not know how he would vote upon this question. I presume he would vote "nay;" and if his colleague will relieve me by telling me whether or not that would be his vote, I should like to vote the same way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not the least means of knowing, but I think the Senator may be safe in voting. I will take the responsibility of releasing him from his pair, as there is not a quorum voting so far.

Mr. WHYTE. I should probably vote with him in the same way. I vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] but believing that if he were present he would vote the same way that I do, I vote "yea," unless some Senator on the other side says it is a political question.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired on all political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire, although I believe it is a little irregular to do so, whether a quorum has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will know when the vote is announced.

Mr. CONKLING. That is very kind of the Chair. The Chair also will know that if we are left without a quorum we may be driven to a call of the House. I withheld my vote, as I observed that several other Senators did theirs. I did not do so to the breaking up of a quorum, but only to the end that the quorum, if it be here, may dispose of the question in its own way.

Mr. VOORHEES. May I ask why the Senator from New York withheld his vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All debate is out of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. This is not debate.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Chair will indulge the Senator from Indiana, as he seems to have been out, I will state that I withheld my vote merely that the Senator and the other Senators of his political persuasion, if they had a quorum, might dispose of this question as they chose without interference from me. I do not wish to withhold my vote so as to retard business.

Mr. HARRIS. Is debate in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is out of order.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I raise the question of order ——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from New York rose to vote, his name will be called. [To the Secretary.] Call the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. Understanding there is no quorum, I vote "nay."

Mr. VOORHEES. No debate, Mr. President.

Mr. CONKLING. What does the Senator from Indiana say?

Mr. VOORHEES. I say debate is out of order.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator speaks so softly we cannot hear him over here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All debate is out of order.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is a little singular after the Senator from New York has spoken——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore rapped to order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will vote when I get a chance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (to the Secretary.) Call the Senator from Vermont.

The Secretary called, at their request, the names of Messrs. EDMUNDS, BLAINE, CHANDLER, INGALLS, CAMERON of Pennsylvania, FERRY, LOGAN, DAWES, BURNSIDE, PADDOCK, ROLLINS, SAUNDERS, and ALLISON, Senators who had withheld their votes, and who, as their names were called, voted "nay."

Mr. BELL. I wish to explain that I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. HEREFORD, (who had voted in the affirmative.) As Senators on the other side seem satisfied with the bill, I change my vote and vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on all political questions.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (who had voted in the affirmative.) As I am paired, as I stated, with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] I withdraw my vote. This seems to be made a political question.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] was called from the Chamber awhile since, and asked me to announce his pair. I have forgotten with what Senator he is paired, but I state the fact that with some Senator on the other side he is paired.

Mr. PENDLETON, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I desire to change my vote to "nay."

Mr. FARLEY, (who had voted in the affirmative.) The voting now shows a political complexion, as no vote in the affirmative is recorded from the other side of the Chamber. I voted to recommit the bill. As Senators have changed their minds on the other side of the House, and as I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES,] I withdraw my vote.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I change my vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. SLATER, (who had voted in the affirmative.) I change my vote, and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 27; as follows:

So the motion to recommit the bill was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. Before the vote is taken, I desire to submit the clauses of the constitution of the State of Florida which have been referred to in this debate. I will say nothing further, but send the clauses to the Reporter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not like the way of sending things to the Reporter, but I wish to say in justice to the Senator from Florida that he has shown me the clauses in the constitution to which he referred which bear out what he said yesterday, in my opinion, entirely. I should have said so before, but forgot it.

The clauses of the constitution of Florida submitted by Mr. CALL are as follows:

We the people of the State of Florida, grateful to almighty God for our freedom, in order to secure its blessings and form a more perfect government, insuring domestic tranquillity, maintaining public order, perpetuating liberty, and guaranteeing equal civil and political rights to all, do establish this constitution.

ARTICLE I.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called,) I was paired yesterday with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] I do not see him in the Chamber at this moment. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when the name of Mr. ANTHONY was called.) My colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is absent from the city, and is paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. BELL, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, (when his name was called.) On this question, as I have stated previously, I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. FARLEY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES, (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.]

Mr. WITHERS, (when Mr. JOHNSTON'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is paired on political questions with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.] My colleague, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. MCPHERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN.] Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANDOLPH, (when his name was called.) On this question, as on all political questions, I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, (when Mr. TELLER'S name was called.) The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is paired on this bill with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] The Senator from Colorado, if here, would vote "nay."

Mr. WHYTE, (when his name was called.) Upon this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the title, so as to make it read, "A bill in relation to juries, and to repeal sections 801, 820, and 821, and part of 800 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF AN ENROLLED BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Enrolled Bills:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Joint Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to change and correct the title of House bill No. 1999, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes,' approved March 4, 1879," as passed by the two Houses of Congress at the present session, by striking out the word "fourth" which occurs therein and inserting in lieu thereof the word "third."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) fixing the date on which the pay of the committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate now adjourn until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and nine minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICT.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 572) to amend an act approved February 24, 1879, entitled "An act to create the northern judicial district of the State of Texas, and to change the eastern and western judicial districts of said State, and to fix the time and places of holding courts in said districts."

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, and the Chair will then ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That so much of the act to which this is amendatory as provides that Jackson County shall be embraced in the western judicial district of Texas be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the said county of Jackson is hereby placed in the eastern judicial district of said State; and all process issued against defendants residing therein shall be returned to Galveston. And all civil causes of action which have accrued in said county, of which the courts of the United States have jurisdiction, shall be cognizable in the court at Galveston, but all offenses committed in said county against the laws of the United States before the passage of this act shall be cognizable in the court of the western district, as provided in said act of the 24th of February, 1879.

SEC. 3. Civil actions or proceedings now pending against parties residing in either of said counties in the courts named in the first and second sections hereof, as provided in the act to which this an amendment, may, on the application of either party, be transferred to the proper court of said district under this act; and in case of such transfer, all papers and files therein, with copies of all journal entries, shall be transferred to the office of the clerk of such court; and the same shall proceed in all respects as though originally commenced in said court. And civil actions or proceedings now pending in the circuit courts at Brownsville, Austin, Galveston, or Tyler, which under this act would be cognizable in some other district, may, on the application of either party, be transferred to the proper court of said district; and in case of such transfer, all papers and files therein, with copies of all journal entries, shall be transferred to the office of the clerk of such court, and the same shall proceed in all respects as though originally commenced in said court.

SEC. 4. The several districts as established in the act to which this is an amendment are hereby declared to be a part of the fifth judicial circuit; and the courts of the said northern district shall have the same jurisdiction as is conferred by law upon the courts of the eastern and western districts of said State; and the circuit court for said northern district shall be held twice a year at Waco on the first Mondays in April and October; at Dallas on the first Mondays in June and December; and at Graham on the first Mondays in February and August; and the circuit court shall be held at Jefferson, in the eastern district, on the second Mondays in February and September, and at San Antonio, in the western district, on the first Mondays in May and November.

SEC. 5. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is taken from the Speaker's table and will be considered as read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman if this bill changes the districts in any respect except as to the one county mentioned in the first part of the bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. It does not change the existing law except that it takes from certain divisions of the court certain counties and makes processes from those counties returnable to the divisions to which they are attached by this bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HENRY. I desire to present a report from the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I withdraw the call for the regular order for the present.

Mr. HENRY. I am instructed by the Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 62) fixing the date on which the pay of committee clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session, to report a substitute therefor, and to ask its consideration at this time.

Mr. CONGER. Is this the regular business?

The SPEAKER. It comes in by consent. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] withdrew the call for the regular order to allow the report to be made.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read, subject to objection.

The substitute reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Joint resolution fixing the date on which the pay of the committee-clerks, pages, and laborers of the House of Representatives, who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session.

Be it resolved, &c., That the pay of the thirty-five clerks to committees of the House of Representatives, heretofore authorized by resolutions of the House, and of the twenty-nine pages, and of the laborers of the House heretofore authorized by law or by resolution of the House, who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session on the day of the organization of the House, the 18th day of March, 1879; and the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay them from that date, without regard to the date of their respective oaths of office.

Mr. DUNNELL. I would like to hear read the original resolution for which that is a substitute.

The original resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution fixing the date on which the payment of the committee-clerks and pages of the House of Representatives who are paid during the session only, shall begin for this session.

Be it resolved, &c., That the pay of the thirty-five clerks to committees of the House of Representatives authorized by resolution of the House of April 22, 1879, and of the pages of the House now on the roll, shall begin for this session on the 18th day of March, 1879, the day of the organization of the House.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) reported as a substitute was received, and read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. DUNNELL. As I understand, the substitute is substantially the original resolution.

Mr. HENRY. The substitute simply makes more definite the parties who are to receive this compensation. This was left under the original resolution more a matter of construction, but in the substitute the numbers are expressly mentioned.

Resolutions of this character have been customary for a great many years. I find on looking as far back as the Thirty-fourth Congress, that in the session commencing on the 3d day of December, 1855, the House not being organized until the 7th of February following, 1856, a resolution of similar import, or similar in substance to the one which is now offered, was passed; and since that time in some mode or other the same thing has been substantially done.

Toward the close of the last Congress a resolution was adopted of which I have a copy, which, after providing for the payment of thirty days' additional pay to the employés of the House, provided further that they should "receive no other compensation for the said time than that herein provided."

When the original resolution for which a substitute is now reported was first introduced in the House I was absent, but from the RECORD I see that objection was made to it on the ground that it was giving double pay to a portion of the employés mentioned in the resolution. From an examination of the appropriation bill for the current year, the explanation is very apparent.

It has been the custom for many years, as I understand, in the appropriation bill, not only to appropriate a certain sum of money for the payment of clerks, pages, and other sessional employés, but to go further and state that the long session shall be considered to mean seven months and the short session shall be considered to mean four months. In the appropriation bill for the current year a sum of money was appropriated for the employés of the last Congress—seven months' pay for the long session and four months' pay for the short session; but by some means or other—I do not know how it happened—the words construing the duration of a session were omitted from the bill; and those words being omitted, a question of construction arose as to whether for the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress these employés could draw four months' pay. Hence this resolution was introduced with the proviso attached to it that they should receive no other compensation for the time embraced in the resolution, because it had been left doubtful whether if they received this money under the resolution they might not also claim four months' compensation under the appropriation bill, although that bill omitted the words defining the duration of the short session to be four months, from the fact that the amount appropriated was exactly four months' compensation for these various employés.

Mr. DUNNELL. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. If this resolution passes, is it true, as asserted the other day when it was before the House, that many of the employés of the House will receive double pay?

Mr. HENRY. Not for the same service.

Mr. DUNNELL. But for a given period of time?

Mr. HENRY. There might have been an additional reason why this resolution was worded as it was, the expression being used "for the same time" because it is known these employés are paid by the day. The clerks receive $6 per day and the other employés are also paid by the day, and instead of saying that they should receive an aggregate sum that form of expression was probably used from the fact that they were paid by the day. But in regard to that I will say further that having been always paid in this mode I do not see how any objection can be made to it. It is unquestionably the fact that the compensation and the duties of the employés of the House are not definitely regulated by law. They have to be decided upon rather as a matter of custom or precedent, and I think it would be wise if the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service would take this matter into consideration and pass some law arranging this definitely, so that there will be no difficulty in the future.

The Committee of Accounts in reporting this resolution have endeavored to be guided by practice upon the subject. But now, in reply to the question asked by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] I will state this, that most of the employés, particularly those employés in the Forty-fifth Congress, were here at the beginning of the session although not regularly sworn into office or regularly appointed, yet they rendered services which were very useful and almost indispensable to the organization of the House and the convenience of its members, and I desire to say that the services provided for in the resolution approved March 3, 1879, were services rendered to the Forty-fifth Congress. It was not supposed or contemplated that another session would occur so soon after. But if we examine the matter upon principle, if there had been an interval of thirty days between the sessions, could any possible objection be made such as is suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL?] The principle is not affected by the fact that the extra session occurred so soon after the 4th of March.

The difficulty is that if any difference is made in this respect then the result evidently would be that the clerks, pages, and other employés who were employés in the House in the Forty-fifth Congress will receive that much less than those appointed for the first time at this session of this Congress, which would operate unjustly, particularly upon those who had been here longer and rendered more service than the new appointees, but if the discrimination were made by reason of the resolution, which was only intended to give them four months' pay, and if the proviso were inserted that the employés of the Forty-fifth Congress should only receive pay from the 4th of April, the result would be that the old employés, those employed in the Forty-fifth Congress, would receive that much less than those employed in the Forty-sixth Congress for the same service.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENRY] that I agree with him entirely that the employés of the House are not overpaid by any means. Some of them are not sufficiently well paid, in my judgment; but the real objection to this resolution is, that it pays a certain number of the employés of the House twice, if they were allowed by the last Congress pay up to the 1st of April. They have drawn pay, and now it is proposed to pay the same men for their services from the 18th of March up to the 4th of April, so that some fifteen or eighteen employés of the House would be paid double; they would have double compensation.

Now, the objection which I have to this resolution is the recognition of the principle of giving double compensation to any employé of the Government. If we do so in the House it will be the only place where it is done in the entire Government. I do not see the necessity for making such a precedent. Let the Committee on Civil Service Reform bring in a bill to adjust these matters, but the provision to pay twice for the same service is to me an objectionable feature in this resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not regard it as double pay at all.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman explain why it is not double pay, if they have already received pay for the services performed?

Mr. STEPHENS. I will. The pay allowed to the employés of the Forty-fifth Congress was for services rendered to that Congress, not to this. It was in the nature of an extra month's pay, which it has been the custom to allow since my first entrance into Congress, and if this Congress had not assembled they would still have got that pay. But Congress has assembled, and those who were paid for services in the last Congress, not this, are in the service again. I do not regard it as double pay at all. It is perfectly right, then, for the new employés as well as the old.

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] cannot deny the fact that some of these employés will receive two pays, one by virtue of services in the Forty-fifth Congress and another by virtue of services in the Forty-sixth Congress. However he may explain it away, they do get two compensations for the same time.

Mr. STEPHENS. That Congress had nothing to do with this. There is no double pay. What was allowed them in the Forty-fifth Congress was for services already rendered.

Mr. ROBINSON. It seems to me that there is another provision in the resolution which is open to serious objection. It proposes to pay certain persons for a time when they rendered no services at all. That is far more objectionable than to pay a man twice for services rendered.

If I understand the resolution, it provides that the pay of all the clerks and pages shall commence from the 18th of March, without regard to the time when they took the oath of office.

Now, when this question was before the House some two weeks ago a twenty-ninth page was added to the list of pages, on motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] and he was put upon the roll, and according to this resolution he will be paid from the 18th of March for a time when he did not serve at all.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The law did not authorize the appointment of that additional page until he was appointed, and when he was paid it was only from the date of his appointment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENRY] if what I have stated is not the fact?

Mr. HENRY. I did not understand the question.

Mr. ROBINSON. The question is, whether the resolution, if passed in its present shape, will not pay certain clerks and pages for a time when they have not been in the service of the House at all?

Mr. HENRY. I presume it will——

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to have the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENRY] answer that question.

Mr. HENRY. I am not prepared to answer the question in regard to the particular page referred to by the gentleman. I do not recollect distinctly the date from which he was employed. I am inclined to think, however, that he was rendering service in some capacity or other before he was appointed by the resolution of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. Provision for this extra page was made in the last Congress by a resolution of the House. The law allowed the Doorkeeper to employ but twenty-eight pages. By a resolution of the House a twenty-ninth page was authorized to be appointed. That page was provided for in the appropriation bill for the next fiscal year, the number of pages being increased by law in that bill to twenty-nine. But at the beginning of this session, before the commencement of the next fiscal year, there was no provision of law authorizing his employment. I understand that he was rendering service all the time, but was not upon the Doorkeeper's roll. A resolution was offered and adopted allowing him to be employed until July next, when the provision applying to the next fiscal year would begin to operate. I am informed that he has been rendering service since the beginning of the present session.

Mr. ROBINSON. If I understand correctly the statement of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] it is this in substance: this page has been about the House rendering service without there being any authority at all for his employment. I do not happen to know him, and I am glad that I do not, for he may be listening to what I am saying, and I wish him to understand that I can have nothing against him personally. But I am against the principle involved in this resolution. I do not think it right, after we have been in session a couple of months, that on somebody's motion an additional page or an additional clerk should be put upon the roll, and then we be afterward called upon to vote pay to him for the entire session. I say that the principle is wrong. If it is right, then we should give double pay to all the boys who have been rendering service here all the time by authority of law. Where is the justice of such a practice as that? If a boy lingers about the Capitol here, hanging upon the skirts of some member until he secures influence enough to get placed upon the roll, and then by a resolution of the House be voted pay for all the time—I think if that has been the practice, it should be investigated by some committee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I would like to ask a question.

Mr. HENRY. I wish to reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON;] afterward I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.]

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. HENRY. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] has made an objection to this resolution, basing his argument upon the ground that if adopted it will pay some of the employés, particularly one of them, for services before they were authorized to render any service. How is this matter to be determined? In the absence of any positive law upon the subject are we to determine it according to precedents, or are we now to establish a new rule and say that at this session we will begin to carry out a new regulation on this subject? Shall we say that although the practice and custom heretofore may have been otherwise, and although these parties may have been actually rendering service all the time, they shall not be paid from the beginning of the session upon the technical ground that they were not regularly installed and sworn into office until some time after the session commenced? Is that the idea of the gentleman?

The gentleman talks about an investigation of this matter. Now, I am perfectly content that he should engage in such an investigation. But how are we to be guided? In the absence of any definite law upon the subject, we must be guided by something. If we are guided by custom and precedent and practice obtaining in former Congresses, I think we will be justified and entirely in the line of duty.

We have examined this matter as carefully as we could, and that is the conclusion to which we have come. It will simplify our proceedings very much to have some definite time fixed at which this pay shall begin, and not have it involve an investigation every time a resolution is offered for the appointment of a page or any other employé, and go back year after year in order to see what the practice upon the subject has been.

In regard to the pay of our employés, I will say that I think it is certainly moderate enough. Why is it that in our appropriation bills provision is made to give our employés four months' pay for a short session, when the session itself lasts only three months? I have no doubt the gentleman himself has voted for that over and over again. Now is not that paying for services not rendered? The reason for that is obvious to all; it is that the compensation of our employés is extremely moderate. All our clerks who are paid by the session receive for the Congress only about $900 a year. They are gentlemen of intelligence and ability, and the business of the House could not be satisfactorily and properly conducted without their very important assistance. It seems to me that the time for which it is proposed to pay them is very moderate. And if our appropriation bills provide four months' pay for a three months' session in order to increase their pay somewhat, I think there can be no possible objection to our following that precedent so far as to make their pay for this session commence from the first day when Congress assembled. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I yielded to the gentleman with the understanding that he would yield to me.

Mr. HENRY. I am under obligation to yield first to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. BUCKNER. I have no doubt that the resolution offered here in regard to the pay of these subordinate officers is equitable and fair and should be adopted. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] makes a false assumption in his argument against this resolution, that the extra compensation given at the last session was paying for four months' service when only three months' service had been rendered.

Now that, I take it, was merely a mode by which Congress determined what should be the compensation for the short session. The compensation was given in the form of pay for thirty days additional, but Congress might just as well have said "We appropriate $150 to each of these employés as extra pay." In contemplation of law it was compensation for the short session. As the chairman of the committee has said, it has been the invariable custom to appropriate for the pay of employés during four months, although the short session never extends beyond three months. That has been the invariable custom of Congress for years past.

Mr. SAMFORD. Did not that custom originate with the view of paying the expenses of employés in returning to their homes?

Mr. BUCKNER. No, sir; that was not the reason. It was considered that in view of the short time the employés were engaged three months' pay was not ample compensation, and in order to give them something like adequate compensation they have received pay for four months.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROBINSON,] I will say that if the date upon which the employé is sworn in is to fix the date from which his salary is to begin, the same rule ought to apply equally to all employés and officers of the Government. If this rule were applied, the gentleman from Massachusetts himself would probably have to pay back into the Treasury something like a year's salary which he has received as a member of this body. Pages and other employés of the House are frequently notified of their appointment immediately after the organization of Congress, and their appointment is actually made at that time although the mere formality of being sworn in is omitted. After they are appointed some time must necessarily elapse before they can get here; they must occupy some time in settling up the business in which they may be engaged. It is certainly just as proper that the employés of the House should receive pay from the time of their appointment, instead of the date on which they are sworn in, as that members of Congress should receive pay for time prior to their taking the official oath.

Mr. HENRY. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SAMFORD.]

Mr. SAMFORD. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the proposition now submitted necessarily involves either double payment for services or payment for no services. As I understand, it has been the custom at every Congress to grant to the employés of the House at the close of a session a month's extra pay. This I never knew before I came here. Whether this custom is right or not, I do not now argue, as it is not before the House, perhaps the question may arise at the end of this session, then I shall not hesitate to take my stand. But if this allowance is right, why not put it in the form of a law? Why should we call a session of three months four months? And why should a long session be called seven months when it does not embrace that much time? A law has been enacted which says that clerks, messengers, pages, and the multitude of employés of this House shall have so much pay per month, which amount is far in excess of what is obtained for the same amount of service in any other calling among our constituents. And then you allow a custom to break down that law, and by a resolution a gratuity of thousands of dollars is given away. You call a session of three months four months, and a long session you call seven months, no matter if it does not last longer than four, five, or six months. By what process of arithmetic is this done? If we were paying out our own money we would hardly be so liberal. But when we are called on by this custom to grant $10,000 of money in our hands in trust, we vote it away to our friends without hesitation.

When this question was before the House the other day, and this objection was made, it was stated by some gentlemen that it was necessary to give one month's extra compensation in lieu of mileage, or something of that kind, in order that the employés of the House might return to their homes. But to-day, when that position is shown to be untenable, because on account of this session following so close upon the last there was no expense incurred in going home, it is said that that is not at all the reason for the allowance, but that this extra allowance is necessary as compensation for services. If it is necessary as compensation, why not make it the law? Let the people of the country know what you are paying.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is an ungracious and unpleasant duty to object to such appropriations as this; because these gentlemen are clever, polite, accommodating, and these offices are filled by our friends, by gentlemen who perform important duties for the House, and against them I have no grievance to make. I only make the objection in obedience to what seems to me a stern requirement of duty. I represent hard-working, honest people who expect me to protest against giving away taxes wrung from them. Why, sir, it does seem as if we are to have no end to the appropriations which this Congress is to make. The other day there was passed through this House an appropriation to pay the families of two gentlemen chosen to the present Congress from $9,000 to $10,000 each, though one of them died during the last Congress and before the beginning of the new term for which he was elected. They were both worthy men, but that was not in issue. On that proposition there were so few of us voting in the negative that the noes were not counted. A custom of this House was invoked for that appropriation; and if a member objected to such he lays himself liable to the unjust, ungenerous, and severe criticism of being a narrow-minded and illiberal demagogue. I am humiliated at such criticism and sensitive to the charge, but I must submit to such humiliation or do violence to my convictions of duty. And when that alternative is presented, I face the charge of demagogism undaunted, and leave the decision to the final judgment of the people who sent me here. To them I am alone responsible.

How does this case stand? It is a case involving about $10,000 extra pay. The resolution authorizing the appointment of many of these employés was actually never passed until the 21st of April, and of course they could not legally serve until then. Until that time there was no authority in many instances for the employment of these messengers and clerks for committees. Yet this resolution proposes to go back and pay unauthorized employés for a month perhaps before their employment——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I beg to correct my friend. The law authorized the appointment of every committee clerk that was appointed when the session began.

Mr. SAMFORD. I understand the fact to be that there was a resolution passed some time in April of this year, providing for the appointment of clerks and messengers to committees that were not previously provided for; and the resolution now before us proposes to pay all employés of the House, including these, from the 18th of March. If so, then such employés are to be paid for services not rendered under this resolution, or which were not authorized by law. I demand a law for the payment of every dollar.

As I understand, many of these employés received pay up to the 4th day of April. Call it what you please—double pay or not—they have received this money either as extra compensation or as a gratuity from the last Congress. At the end of the last Congress a resolution was passed to pay to all employés of the House one month's extra pay. The last Congress adjourned on the 4th of March. So the one month's pay extended to April 4. Yet this resolution pays to every employé of the present House who was also an employé of the last House his salary commencing from March 18. Then from March 18 to April 4 at least must be double pay for the same time—unless the month's extra pay was compensation for services during last Congress.

It may be right the compensation may be too little; but if it is, then increase the salary by law; that we will discuss; it is the principle against which I am contending to-day, of leaving it within the discretion of Congress to grant these gratuities every time they are asked. And we know many members have their friends among these gentlemen, and it becomes unpopular to oppose such bills. As an instance, we have the case of a page appointed, as stated by one gentleman, a few days ago, or perhaps a week or two ago. I know nothing of this, or who the page is, who goes back and receives compensation—it amounts to a small matter, it is true—but he receives compensation from the 18th of March although not recognized then as a legal employé upon this floor, and perhaps not serving——

Mr. ELAM. Does the gentleman from Alabama mean to say that the employés of this House have been paid compensation from the adjournment on the 4th of March last to the assembling of the Forty-sixth Congress?

Mr. SAMFORD. Until the 4th of April, as I understand it; that is, those who were also employés of the last Congress.

Mr. ELAM. From the 4th of March last?

Mr. SAMFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELAM. From the time of the adjournment of the last Congress to the 18th of March, when this Congress assembled?

Mr. SAMFORD. I understand this to be the case, that every employé of the last Congress who is an employé of this Congress received compensation from the 4th day of March to the 4th day of April by virtue of that custom which grants to all employés an extra month's pay. It may be called compensation for the Forty-fifth Congress, or for a month afterward. It is the same, no matter what it is called.

Mr. ELAM. By the action of this Congress or the action of the last Congress?

Mr. SAMFORD. By the action of last Congress.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SAMFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman from Alabama is a lawyer and a cultivated gentleman, and I think he will appreciate the question which I will put to him. Now, suppose he employed a man to work for him for twelve months, and at the end of that time should say to him, "I have not given you enough for your service, and I will now give you what is equal to pay for thirty days more." Suppose the gentleman should engage him during the next ten days to work for him for another year, would it be manly, would it be just to say to that employé "I will charge you with the extra pay which I gave you for last year's service?" Would the gentleman do it?

Mr. SAMFORD. No, sir; but then I have the right to do with my own money as I please, to pay it as extra compensation, or to give it away if I like, and no one has a right to complain, but I have not the right to do as I please with the people's money. They intrust me with it to pay it out according to law, and in no event have I a right to use it as a gratuity.

Mr. SPARKS. Let the gentleman answer this question: Did we give it to them as a gift?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It was in payment for past services.

Mr. SPARKS. For past services?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir; for services during the past Congress.

Mr. SPARKS. A month's pay in advance for services in the past is simply nonsense. It was to clean up their business.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to ask, by the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, a question of the gentleman from Maryland. Will any of these clerks, under the resolution, get double pay?

Mr. SAMFORD. I will answer that. The gentleman from Maryland has stated that by construction of the law it necessarily does give double pay. It is either double pay or pay for no service, because it covers the same time.

Now, in reference to the question asked me by the gentleman from Virginia, I have only to say that if I should employ a man in my individual capacity and he should perform his work so well that I should be induced to give him a gratuity, paying him an extra amount of money, of course I have the right to do so; but what right have we to come here as the representatives of the people and take their money and give it in the way of gratuity even to the extent of one farthing? Neither have we the right, after the performance of the services, to pay more than the contract; not even if the services performed were worth more.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It is in payment for past service.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman from Alabama claim these employés of the House are paid too much?

Mr. SAMFORD. The gentleman asked me if I claim these employés are paid too much. I stated at the outset that on that question I am not advised. There is such a countless swarm of offices here that I do not know what they get. It is the principle, however, against which I am contending. If the gentleman thinks they are paid too little, we will consider that question when a law is offered to increase their compensation.

Mr. FINLEY. Allow me to say to the gentleman that the Senate employés holding like positions have always been paid much higher salaries than the employés in this House.

Mr. SAMFORD. Then the Senate employés are paid too much. If they are not paid too much, why, then, do these employés in this House serve for less pay when they are equally efficient. The employés of this House are certainly efficient, capable, and in every way worthy gentlemen. I find just such all over this country working for less than they are paid, who would gladly take the places of the Senate employés at the salary paid to the employés of the House. And they should have them if those in place refuse to take less. I know many worthy men of culture, intelligence, efficiency, and refinement, wearily toiling and struggling for daily bread, who foot all these bills, who would gladly take these places and not complain.

I have said all I desire to say. Judging from my past experience in this House it is utterly impossible to get enough men to vote on these questions, even to call the yeas and nays in many cases; otherwise I would content myself with a silent vote. Without intending to do any injustice to the employés of the House—because, as I remarked awhile ago, I consider them a worthy class of citizens; but we must not forget we have worthy citizens away from here whose burdens of taxation are hard to be borne, and they, too, must be remembered—in their behalf, and in order to put myself on the record as I desire to stand there, I object to the payment of a cent as gratuity or the payment of any money except in accordance with law. I trust my opposition, though it may be so construed, is not impelled by a little, mean spirit of demagogism, which I despise. Neither, Mr. Speaker, do I assume extra honesty or an extra amount of political virtue. Many gentlemen in this House as honest, as virtuous, as careful of the public money as I am, see this question in a different light. I do not for a moment entertain, much less insinuate, unworthy motives for their action. They act honestly, according to their convictions. I claim the privilege of acting in the light of my duty as I understand it. This I shall continue to do.

Mr. TALBOTT. Could it be known that the officers paid the extra month's pay by the Forty-fifth Congress would be officers of the Forty-sixth Congress?

Mr. SAMFORD. It could not.

Mr. TALBOTT. Then that shows conclusively that the pay was not given to them as officers of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. SAMFORD. But the distinguished gentleman who reports the bill says he reports it for the purpose of paying these employés for services rendered from the 18th March, and that it is entirely within the discretion of the House whether they shall be paid from that date. That being the case, when we come back and find the past Congress has paid for this identical time, the answer to the question of my friend from Maryland is that we ought not to pay them again when it is a matter within our discretion. We should exercise our discretion, if there is no legal claim, by giving nothing when we find the preceding Congress has paid for the same time. Public servants should be just with the public funds, but they have no right to be generous.

Mr. SPRINGER. By a reference to the Journal of the Forty-third Congress, I find that on the last day of the last session of that Congress Mr. Hoskins, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to, namely:

That the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and hereby directed to pay to all clerks and employés of the House of Representatives not otherwise provided for and who do not receive annual salaries, their salaries for one month from the close of the session.

That resolution was agreed to unanimously. It has been the custom of this House at the close of the session to give its employés one month's extra pay; the object being to cover the expense of traveling to and from the capital.

Mr. SAMFORD. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that it has been customary to give one month's extra pay in lieu of paying the expenses of these employés home?

Mr. SPRINGER. There are two things to be considered in connection with each other; the shortness of the session and the fact that these employés are obliged to come from their homes and return.

Mr. SAMFORD. When I asked the same question of another friend of the bill he answered "no," and now the gentleman from Illinois says "yes."

Mr. SPRINGER. I suppose we all have a right to our own opinions on the subject. This extra compensation is in recognition of past services and they are entitled to it. I do not think we should act meanly; and having given a month's extra pay to some of these clerks or some of these little pages who are again employed by the House, that we should reach back our hands and take that month's pay from them I think would be a small business for the House of Representatives to be engaged in; and while I am prepared to go as far as any man on this floor in the line of economy, I submit the time thus occupied in talking about this matter will cost more than all that will be saved in taking back this extra compensation. Therefore if the gentleman from Maryland will yield to me for that purpose I will call the previous question.

Mr. SPARKS rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HENRY] is entitled to the floor. To whom does he yield?

Mr. HENRY. I now insist on the previous question.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman not allow me to offer an amendment? [Cries of "Question!" "Vote!"] Will the gentleman let the amendment be read?

Mr. HENRY. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask that the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland does not yield.

Mr. SPARKS. I charge you are paying these officers twice for the same service. I charge that here, and this amendment prevents it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Illinois that the remedy is to vote down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to know what has become of the amendment I offered providing that these employés should not receive double pay.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that is in the committee.

Mr. HENRY. I will state in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee that this is a substitute for both the original resolution and the amendment. It is intended to cover all. Now I insist on the previous question.

Mr. SPARKS. It does not cover the amendment at all.

Mr. HENRY. It is intended to be a substitute for all.

Mr. SPARKS. It covers it up so that it cannot be seen.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 82, noes 31.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. HENRY, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPARKS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 126, noes 25.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SAMFORD. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, thirty-two members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 73, not voting 98; as follows:

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the Senate of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 491) in relation to the accounts of the United States entomological commission; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 25) authorizing the Public Printer to bind in cloth two volumes of Sailing Directions for the United States Hydrographic Office.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2020) to establish post-routes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 516) to extend the time of special postal service until service can be obtained by advertisement.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 435) to correct the reading of an act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1879.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations at this time a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and that the bill be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations. On that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. All points of order to be reserved.

The SPEAKER. They will be reserved.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2175) was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCGOWAN and Mr. BRIGHT called for the regular order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to raise the question of consideration, and to move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making additional appropriations for the Post-Office Department.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the first business in order, this being Friday, is the call of committees for reports of a private nature during the morning hour. The only way to reach the object of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be to dispense with the morning hour for to-day, which under the rule will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. MCGOWAN. Should the morning hour be dispensed with, would not the special order coming over from yesterday, the pleuro-pneumonia bill, be the first business in order?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand that it is competent for the House to take up any business it may desire.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration could be raised.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order. The bill referred to by my colleague [Mr. CANNON] is public business. This being private bill day, should the morning hour be dispensed with, it would not be in order for my colleague then to move to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman could make that motion, but the Chair would be compelled to recognize first a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly, and should that be voted down——

The SPEAKER. Then the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] would be in order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to dispense with the morning hour for to-day.

The SPEAKER. That will require a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the motion will not be agreed to.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois; and upon a division there were—ayes 79, noes 27.

Mr. ACKLEN. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, and Mr. BRIGHT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 110, noes 38.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the morning hour for to-day was dispensed with.

Mr. ACKLEN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. If that motion shall be voted down, will it then be in order for my colleague [Mr. CANNON] to submit his motion?

The SPEAKER. If that motion shall be voted down, then the day will be cleared of private business by action of the House. It would then become public bill day, and the first business in order would be the unfinished business of yesterday, which will come over as the special order for to-day. But any member can raise the question of consideration against the unfinished business; and should the House refuse to proceed with the consideration of that unfinished business, then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] can submit his motion.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. ACKLEN to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; and upon a division—ayes 36, noes not counted—it was not agreed to.

Mr. MCGOWAN. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday coming over to to-day, being the bill (H. R. No. 1378) to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle and the spread of infectious or contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I raise the question of consideration on that bill, and give notice that I do so for the purpose of obtaining an opportunity to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill making further appropriations for the Post-Office Department.

The question was taken upon proceeding with the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday; and upon a division there were—ayes 31, noes 78.

Mr. FINLEY. I call for tellers.

Mr. O'NEILL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 8 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] raise the question of a quorum, or call for tellers?

Mr. FINLEY. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, there being but 8 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the House refused to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I move that all general debate on that bill be limited to two hours.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he will not consent that the House take up this bill on Tuesday next after the morning hour?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That would be equivalent to no consideration at all, because the general appropriation bills would then be under consideration.

Mr. O'NEILL. There are gentlemen absent to-day who are anxious to be present when this bill is considered and to take part in the debate. They are absent because of an understanding—I do not say an understanding with the gentleman from Illinois—that this bill would not be considered before next Tuesday after the morning hour. I hope the gentleman will permit it to go over until that time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have only to say in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I am anxious this bill should be disposed of in some way, and I am not responsible for other gentlemen being absent from the House. Certainly no man has had any understanding with me, nor I apprehend with anybody else, that the bill should go over until next Tuesday. Personally I would be content to let this bill sleep during the session; but, in fairness to the committee and the House, I desire that an opportunity be given for its consideration. I apprehend that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] with his views, is standing in his own light in offering opposition to this proposition.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want this bill to be considered when its friends are here; and I believe that on Tuesday next we shall have here a sufficient number to vote to carry out the existing law in reference to the increased pay of letter-carriers. I desire to have appropriations made in conformity with existing law. I do not wish to aid in the passage, or, if I can help it, to permit the passage, of a bill which is going to restrict in any way the payment of the salaries of letter-carriers as now provided for by law.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, that when the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on House bill No. 2002 all general debate terminate in two hours, there were—ayes 72, noes 20.

Mr. COFFROTH. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. CANNON, of Illinois] whether one hour would not be long enough for general debate. If so, I think we can arrange the matter without any difficulty.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. In naming two hours, I have yielded to the importunity of parties who are in favor of the bill. I would be satisfied with one hour's debate; but I prefer not to modify my motion.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman in charge of this bill will propose one hour as the limitation of debate.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The Committee of the Whole can rise at any time for the purpose of having the House limit the debate.

The SPEAKER. The vote on the motion to limit debate was ayes 72, noes 20. The point is made that no quorum voted, and the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. COFFROTH. I withdraw the point that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being withdrawn, the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to limit debate in Committee of the Whole to two hours is agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering House bill No. 2002, the motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. REAGAN in the chair.

REPORTS OF SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The first business on the Public Calendar in Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 1493) defining the duties of reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, fixing his compensation, and providing for the publishing and distribution of said reports.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope that this bill will be proceeded with. It will take only a few moments; and it is an important measure.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move that the bill be laid aside.

The motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, was agreed to.

PAY OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

The next business on the Public Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this bill which has been reported by order of the Committee on Appropriations recommends an appropriation of $25,000 to pay letter-carriers, being an increase of salary from the 21st of February last, to the close of this fiscal year. It also proposes to appropriate $131,900 in addition to the appropriation that was made at the last session of Congress, for the next fiscal year. The bill also provides for a change of salaries of letter-carriers as fixed by the law of the 21st of February last, and that the free-delivery service shall not be extended to cities having less than thirty thousand inhabitants within the corporate limits, in lieu of twenty thousand inhabitants, or cities of less than twenty thousand population but yielding $20,000 gross revenue.

Most members are familiar with the letter-carrier system; but if they will bear with me, I will briefly refer to what was the law prior to the late act of the 21st of February last, the changes made by it, and the circumstances under which it was passed. I will also explain what this bill provides, stating the amount necessary to be appropriated by the bill if the amendments which we recommend be made, and the amount necessary to be appropriated should the law remain as amended by act of February last. The letter-carrier system was inaugurated in 1864, if I remember rightly. Up to 1874 it was extended to places which had twenty thousand inhabitants within the delivery of the post-office. Under the operation of that law, by counting the inhabitants of the adjacent rural districts, quite a number of small cities of from ten thousand to fifteen thousand inhabitants secured free delivery. As the local postages were very small in this class of cities and the expense quite heavy, in 1874 Congress passed an act which provided that thereafter the service should not be extended to any city having less than thirty thousand inhabitants within its corporate limits, and so the law remained to the 21st of February last.

The service now exists in eighty-eight cities, and cost in the fiscal year ending June 31, 1876, $2,000,000, which appropriation was made by the last republican Congress. The democracy came into power in the Forty-fourth Congress in this House, and under the lead of the then chairman of Appropriations, and now Speaker, [Mr. RANDALL,] the other side of the House inaugurated as they claimed an era of retrenchment and reform, and one of the chief priests was the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] and instead of appropriating for the letter-carrier service at the rate of $2,000,000 per annum, the appropriation for the year ending June, 1877, was $1,900,000; for the year ending June, 1878, $1,825,000; for the year ending June, 1879, $1,875,000; for the year ending June, 1880, $2,000,000; saving in four years $400,000 for this service alone, and fairness compels me to state that in this case the saving was an apt and proper one to be made. This saving was brought about by a reduction of the salaries paid to carriers, which up to the 21st day of February last were in cities of one hundred thousand inhabitants and over, as follows: To first grade of carriers, $641.25 per annum; to second grade of carriers, $736.25 per annum; to third grade of carriers, $831.25 per annum; while in cities of less than one hundred thousand inhabitants they were as follows: To first grade of carriers, $546.25 per annum; to second grade of carriers, $641.25 per annum; to third grade of carriers, $730.26. Over three-fourths of these carriers, however, were paid at the maximum rates of $736.25 and $831.25 respectively, as will be shown by the following statement made by the superintendent of free-delivery service a year ago:

* There are also 45 auxiliary carriers at $400 each a year.

† At $975 per annum.

‡ Total number of carriers of this class includes 45 auxiliaries.

There are 593 carriers employed at second-class offices; 72 at $575, 51 at $675, and 470 at $775.

A deduction of 5 per cent. per annum is made on the above salaries, excepting auxiliaries, owing to the insufficiency of the appropriation.

Total number of carriers in service at this date, 2,275.

These salaries were paid under section 3866 of the Revised Statutes, which allowed the Postmaster-General to fix the salaries of carriers at not exceeding $800 per annum, and for fidelity, &c., not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

On the 21st of February last an act was passed (the manner in which it passed I will speak of later) which provides (section 1) that in cities containing a population of seventy-five thousand or more there shall be two classes of carriers, to be fixed by the Postmaster-General, in which the salaries of the first class of carriers shall be $1,000 per annum, and of the second class $800 per annum, and that the number of carriers receiving $1,000 salary shall not be less than one-half nor more than two-thirds of the whole number of carriers actually in service in the city in which they are employed; thus it will be seen that at least one-half of the carriers in this class of cities, or two-thirds, if money enough is appropriated, will have their salaries increased from $831.25 per annum to $1,000 per annum, while a very considerable number have their salaries decreased from $831.25 to $800 per annum.

The act further provides that in all cities of less than seventy-five thousand population there shall be only one class of carriers who shall receive $850 per annum, an increase of from $100 to $214 to the carriers in this class of cities.

The appropriation for the current fiscal year is $1,875,000, which is ample were it not for the legislation of February last. The appropriation for this service for the next fiscal year was made at the last session for $2,000,000, which is ample for the service including all extension of same were it not for the same legislation, and was made without reference to such legislation. As the act of February 21 went into effect at once, and as Congress did not make an additional appropriation to meet the increase for the present year caused by it, or for the next fiscal year, the Postmaster-General had to choose between disregarding the act or putting the same in force by the appointment of carriers under it and their payment accordingly, which latter course would have compelled him to discharge about 20 per cent. of the present force of carriers to bring his expenditures within the appropriations. He chose the former course, and the act of February is not in operation except so far as it operates without action by the Postmaster-General under it.

Under the law prior to February there were no classes in the meaning of that law of letter-carriers, and as the Postmaster-General has not designated any carriers of the first or second class in cities of seventy-five thousand or more there are none in existence entitled to receive the eight-hundred-dollar and one-thousand-dollar salaries therein provided. The truth is that the payments have been continued to more than three-fourths of the carriers in that class of cities at the rate of $831.25, the same as if said act had never been passed. Hence the committee do not recommend any appropriation of a deficiency to pay carriers in that class of cities under the new law for the present fiscal year; and in the event Congress should make such deficiency appropriation for the maximum of two-thirds of the carriers, at the rate of $1,000 per year, the other one-third of carriers would only be entitled to pay at the rate of $800 per annum, whereas in fact they have been receiving pay since the passage of this act at the rate of $831.25. So the committee seek to legalize the payments that have been made to these carriers, and continue them at the same rate for the remainder of this fiscal year.

The committee recommend an appropriation of $25,000 to pay the increase of salaries by act of last February to carriers in cities of less than seventy-five thousand, for the reason that the law only makes one class of carriers in those cities at a salary of $850 per annum, and as to all carriers in the service in those cities said act executes itself without prior action or designation by the Postmaster-General. The minimum additional appropriation for the next fiscal year to pay the salaries of letter-carriers under said act is $247,200, while the maximum appropriation is $306,800; while the amount necessary to extend the service to cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and $20,000 gross revenues is for the next fiscal year $140,250, which leaves the minimum additional appropriation to carry into full force the present law, including the deficiency, $411,925, and the maximum, $471,525.

The committee deemed it wise to recommend to the House legislation amending the law and fixing the salaries of letter-carriers to commence on the 1st day of July next, in cities of seventy-five thousand and more population, at $800 and $900 per annum, and at $800 per annum in cities of less than seventy-five thousand population. If the House shall adopt the suggestion of the committee in this and other respects, the amount necessary to appropriate for the next fiscal year additional will be $131,900.

The superintendent of the free-delivery service, who has been in service as such since its commencement, and is perhaps the most competent man touching the same in the country, is of opinion that the salaries of letter-carriers should be fixed in cities of one hundred thousand population and over at the rate of $800 and $900 per annum, and in cities under one hundred thousand population at the rate of $700 and $800 per annum.

Mr. Chairman, having briefly stated the recommendations of the committee, I desire to refer to the manner in which the act of February 21 was passed.

About the close of the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, in June, 1878, just before the expiration of that session, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] placed that act on its passage under a suspension of the rules. There was no discussion upon that bill. The motion to suspend the rules cut off all debate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. The bill had been considered before.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The bill had never been considered and was not a bill reported by the Post-Office Committee. Some months prior to that time, as I shall presently show——

Mr. KEIFER. It is the same bill with my amendments.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is an entirely different bill, as I shall show the gentleman.

Now, I desire to state that in my opinion the present pay of carriers, which averages about $800 per annum, is sufficient; and the pay of $800 and $900 recommended by the committee is ample, in fact far more than is paid to mechanics and skilled laborers throughout the country. A mechanic serves his apprenticeship, and his pay now throughout the country is $2 per day or $600 per annum, while the pay fixed by this bill where skill is not required and constant employment is given is one-half more than for skilled labor and more by far than they can realize at any other calling.

I had occasion to examine the English estimates the other day, and I find the English government pay their letter-carriers, all allowances included, at the commencement of the service $275 a year, and it takes twelve years' faithful service through summer and winter to get up to $400 a year, which is the maximum.

Mr. O'NEILL. Where is that?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. In Great Britain.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman knows that these people in England do not live, do not clothe themselves and fare as the American citizens do.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield. If the gentleman will do me the courtesy to ask me to yield I may do so. But I do not wish him to inject his speeches into mine without my permission.

Mr. O'NEILL. I did not know my friend was quite so sensitive. I now request him to yield to me that I may ask him a question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. O'NEILL. Does the gentleman not know that the Englishman does not live as the American citizen lives; that he neither eats nor is clad nor is housed as the American citizen is and ought to be, whether he is a Government official or not? There is no comparison to be made between the English official and the American official.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield for a speech. The gentleman asks me a question, and I will answer it. I want to be candid. I do know that wages are higher in this country than in Great Britain or any other country, and they ought to be and I want them to be. But mind you, in Great Britain the rate of compensation is from $275 to $400, the amount after twelve years' service being $400. Now, as our rate of compensation is considerably over double that amount, it occurs to me that perhaps it is enough.

The gentleman has asked me a question, and if he is disposed to answer one I will ask him one.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will do so with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Do you not know that in the cities of Philadelphia and New York there is a grade of letter-carriers, small in number, who are called auxiliaries, and are paid at the rate of $400 a year; and do you not know further that applicants come by scores applying for these places and assign as a reason that even $400 a year is better pay than they can make at anything else?

Mr. O'NEILL. I will grant that men seek offices of which the salary is small, per diem salaries which are small, but if we adhere to the legislation of the last Congress the men to-day who take these places of $400 in Philadelphia or New York or elsewhere will be sure to have promotion; if he be a meritorious man it is sure that he will deserve promotion, and I think that in the appointment of employés in the Post-Office Department and Internal-Revenue department and in the Customs department, it is important that we should give the man appointed a chance to be promoted.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. As the law now stands the fact remains that thousands of men are anxious to take these places at half what they get under the law.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for a moment.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. O'NEILL. I simply want to ask you a question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Well, sir; certainly I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will ask the gentleman if in the State of Illinois in his congressional district there are not hundreds of men who would be glad to serve their country in the Congress of the United States, irrespective of the amount of the pay? That shows that the average American citizen desires public office and will hunt for public office wherever it may be. There may be hundreds of candidates in the gentleman's district for the congressional nomination. I hope they may not be able to defeat him; but I say that an American citizen is proud of holding office, and he should be; but he should seek it and not have it thrust upon him against his will. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman comes here with that same stale assertion. Yes, sir; there are men in my congressional district who would be glad to come without any pay, and I suspect that there are men of that class in the gentleman's district.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes: but I hope they will not succeed. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I want to say, as the gentleman sees fit to refer to my congressional district, that there are few mechanics or farmers with small farms with a fee-simple of eighty acres, who make $400 a year, much less $831, the amount paid to the carriers.

Mr. McCOOK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If gentlemen will possess themselves with patience I will yield to everybody.

Mr. COX. Go along quietly. Do not excite yourself. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am not here to say anything against this class of public officers; they are a hard-working, honest, faithful, industrious class of public employés, and ought to be paid every dollar they earn, and paid liberally, and I am for paying them in that way.

Mr. McCOOK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. McCOOK. As he has referred to the city of New York in connection with this bill, and as Congress some time ago established eight hours as a proper day's work, and conceding that $2 a day is the average wage for skilled labor in this country, I would like to know from the gentleman why when employés of the Government work from twelve to eighteen hours a day that fact ought not to be taken into consideration in the determination of the question as to the amount they shall receive per diem?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman [Mr. McCOOK] in answer to his question if he knows how many hours these carriers are employed?

Mr. COX. Do not get excited, now.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have not had occasion to resort to means of excitement.

Mr. McCOOK. I concede that I have no personal knowledge about this matter, but I have official information that the average day's work of a carrier in New York is certainly twelve hours.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Where did the gentleman receive that information from?

Mr. McCOOK. From the postmaster of the city of New York.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Postmaster James?

Mr. McCOOK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Officially?

Mr. McCOOK. I heard it from him in conversation, and I say another thing: the majority of these letter-carriers are discharged soldiers, and I never heard any complaint of them.

Mr. COX. Now give it up.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Ah, the gentleman says "give it up." If the House sees proper to give these men $1,000 a year, as the law does which the gentleman drove through under a suspension of the rules, of course I cannot help it. But the House will not do it until after it has been placed in possession of the facts surrounding this question.

A MEMBER. And the country, too.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes; and the country, too.

Mr. COX. Do not get excited.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now, I submit to the facile gentleman from New York, who thunders periodically in the economical index just before an election, that I am not getting excited, and I ask that you do not get excited over this extravagant and worse than useless legislation that you forced through the House.

Mr. O'NEILL. By how large a majority? By more than a two-thirds vote?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman jumps; it must hurt. I will come to that a little later.

Mr. COX. Take your time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Fear not; I propose to take my time. This letter-carrier system may be needed in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, and other large cities. But I do not think it is really needed in cities of less than thirty thousand inhabitants. It has been established in cities of thirty thousand inhabitants, and I do not propose for one to advocate a law that will change that limit.

Now, one word with regard to the compensation of employés, and then I will speak of the provisions of that law in another aspect. In the post-offices of the United States there are over four thousand clerks, nearly double the number of letter-carriers. Now I beg gentlemen who are so fierce to raise the salaries of the letter-carriers to take note of the fact, if they have any interest in it, that there are twice as many post-office clerks to help set up nominating conventions that there are of letter-carriers, and those clerks get but $775 a year each.

M. O'NEILL. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly, I will yield for a question.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman is very courteous in yielding to every one, and I thank him. Does he not know that the clerks in the post-offices in the free-delivery cities, the larger cities, such as New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Chicago, and others, work but eight hours a day each? They work either from eight o'clock in the morning until four o'clock in the afternoon, or from four in the afternoon until twelve at night, or from twelve at night until eight o'clock the next morning. Some of them do not receive as much pay——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I did not yield for a speech.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not want to make a speech, but I want to set the gentleman right and the House right on this question. I regret that my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] is now absent, for he has all the information upon this subject and can state to the House——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield to the gentleman for a eulogy on his colleague.

Mr. O'NEILL. These clerks work but eight hours a day, yet many of them receive $1,000 a year. There is no comparison between the work of the clerks in the post-offices and the work of the letter-carriers. I will say in conclusion that some of those clerks receive $1,200, $1,400, or $1,800 a year; and they deserve such pay; they do work which should be compensated by such salaries.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, from the time, eighteen months ago, when the effort to raise the salaries of this class of governmental employés commenced, no man has been able to say a word in the House upon this question without stirring up the bees around him as thickly as they are stirred up when swarming.

Mr. O'NEILL. What do you mean?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I mean just what I say. I hope I will be permitted now to go on and reply to the remark of the gentleman. I state again that the average pay of clerks in the post-offices of the United States is $775 a year. It is true that there are a few who get $1,200, $1,400, or even $1,800; but that is not the usual rate. For example, the postmaster at Springfield, Illinois, told me that he paid a gentleman, who was at one time auditor of the State and a very competent man, $600 a year to act as his chief clerk. This is all the salary which the Government allowed for the service. But the higher salaries paid in the great cities swell the average to $775.

Now, sir, the postmasters of the United States, nearly all of whom pay their own rent and their own clerk hire, and invariably do where the revenue of the office is under $2,000 a year, receive on the average $195 a year total salary.

Mr. O'NEILL. At some of those post-offices there are hardly a hundred letters received or sent away during a year.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I am speaking of the average pay received by postmasters——

Mr. O'NEILL. Taking thirty-five thousand or thirty-six thousand post-offices in the country.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And nearly all of whom pay their own rent, their own fuel, their own clerk hire. Yet their average pay, taking the great salaries and the small, is $195 a year. These letter-carriers get $831, nearly all of them; and gentlemen insist on their receiving $1,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman one question. Do not a great many of these postmasters keep stores or carry on other business for a living——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL. And they take their little salaries as pin money for their families.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly; a great many of them do. I give the fact for what it is worth. The gentleman may quarrel with the fact; but he must not quarrel with me.

Mr. O'NEILL. Certainly not. I think the gentleman one of the blandest of men. I would not quarrel with so clever a man, who gives me a chance to set him right when he is wrong.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And I call upon the Committee of the Whole to witness that I must necessarily be pretty clever under the gentleman's frequent interruptions.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to keep the gentleman out of error; I do it for his own sake.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman is very kind; but the moment you tread upon a piece of pig-iron or the heel of a letter-carrier he is all enthusiasm, as I have noticed ever since I have been in Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAYNE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish the gentleman would state why it is that in the fourth section the compensation for first-class carriers is fixed at $900 per annum, while in the fifth section, for cities having less than seventy-five thousand population, the salary is fixed at $800. Was it not within the knowledge of the committee that in cities of from forty thousand to seventy-five thousand inhabitants the distance which the carriers are obliged to walk and the exposure to which they are subjected are greater than in larger cities, where the area which each carrier traverses is comparatively limited? Do not the committee think that unfair and unjust?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I cannot yield for a speech. The gentleman has asked a question. I will answer it. Of course seventy-five thousand people, when they are not as close together in one place as in another, are more scattered. [Laughter.] There is no question about that. Gentlemen from New York claim that the service in that city is the hardest; gentlemen from other cities make the same claim for their localities. I think that $800 a year is good, fair pay for the letter-carrier in a city having less than seventy-five thousand inhabitants, and that from $800 to $900 is good, fair pay in the other class of cities.

Now, I wish to again call attention to the last section of the law as passed in February, that I may compare it with the amendment proposed by the committee. The law of last February provides in substance that letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail matter as frequently as the public convenience may require at every post-office where the population is twenty thousand.

To come within this provision, a city must have twenty thousand inhabitants within its corporate limits; yet that could not command quite votes enough to suspend the rules when my economical friend from New York [Mr. COX] made that motion, and he put this into the bill:

And at post-offices which produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $20,000.

And that brought it.

Why, said my genial friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] did it not pass by over a two-thirds vote? Certainly; but who passed it? When you come to analyze the vote you will find that the men who passed it were the men who had their letter-carriers beseeching them for increase of pay, joined to every man who had a city with twenty thousand population and joined to every man who had a city in his district which yielded $20,000 gross revenue, or which it was hoped would yield that revenue in two or three years; and was it all in order that they might get in their little cities five letter-carriers—for that is the number—employed at $850 a year each, to deliver letters in those little cities of seven, eight, nine, or ten thousand inhabitants?

We are told they need them in those little cities, those five letter-carriers at $850 a year each. What for? To deliver letters in those cities of seven, eight, nine, or ten thousand inhabitants. Oh, yes; they may be needed there for one thing, namely, to keep the other fellow from beating somebody in securing the nomination for a congressional race. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The gentleman has informed us who voted for the bill; now will the gentleman be kind enough to tell us who voted against it?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir, I will; those who were opposed to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEIFER. Those who wanted to make a little cheap capital.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Ah, says my genial friend from Ohio, "It was opposed by those who wanted to make a little cheap capital." I ask my friend to explain how many cities there are yielding $20,000 gross revenue and having twenty thousand inhabitants in his district to make him so virtuous as to accuse me of wanting to make cheap capital in advocating this measure?

Mr. KEIFER. I should be glad to answer the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I have just one city in my district that pays a net revenue over and above all the expenses of the Government of $28,000—more than enough to run all the expenses of the office, and which has contributed in some degree toward running the offices in the gentleman's district and in other districts. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. What city is it?

Mr. KEIFER. The city of Springfield.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Twenty-eight thousand dollars.

Mr. KEIFER. Thirty-four thousand and odd dollars is the gross revenue, and the expenses are about seven thousand, leaving $28,000 which we contribute annually to help carry on the system in places where they cannot support themselves, and if you will give us $3,000 more of our own money we will have a free-delivery system.

Mr. COX rose.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield until I have replied to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COX. You do not yield to me.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment. He knows I will always yield to him. The gentleman from Ohio has seen proper to say that I and all those who agree with me only wished to make a little cheap capital. Now, I retort upon him, and I have a right to do so, that the anxiety of Springfield for these five letter-carriers may possibly have had some little influence upon him in voting for the bill. But let that go for what it is worth.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me say, if the gentleman will allow me, that that is a thing which does have an influence upon me, and every man will say we are entitled to have justice done us and not to have a man who uses our money in his district get up and make a speech assailing us because we had voted in the interest of our own constituents.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, my district is as thickly settled and comes as near paying the expenses of the postal system as does the gentleman's district.

Mr. KEIFER. No, sir.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir, my State of Illinois comes as near paying the expenses of the Post-Office Department as the gentleman's State of Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman ought not to dodge my question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not dodge the gentleman's question, and I state here and now that my State and my district come as near paying the expenses of the Post-Office Department as the gentleman's district and State.

Mr. KEIFER rose.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will not yield for the present. If the gentleman from Ohio does not want anything said he does not like let him keep the peace himself.

The law extends the system to cities of $20,000 gross revenue. Now, what is that revenue made of? It arises from the sale of postage-stamps and from box rents. From one-fifth to one-fourth of the revenues of this class of cities come from box rents only. Now, in case your free-delivery system is established, away go your box rents. The moment you put this service in cities where there are $20,000 of gross revenue, that moment you impair the revenues by from $3,500 to $5,000 because you cut off nearly all the box rents; and the moment you put on the five carriers you swell the expenditures over $4,000 a year. Thus the candle burns at both ends.

Now let us see how the gross revenues can be made. I have got some pretty good towns in my district, three or four, that yield all the way from $14,000 to $17,000 a year. I undertake to say there is no town in this country of five thousand people where you could not start out five men and by working one week they could swell the gross revenues up to $20,000 a year without one dollar of expenditure except their traveling expenses. And I will tell you how. It is just as easy and a little easier for the cross-roads post-offices, for all post-offices yielding under $1,000 of revenue, to get their supplies from the larger towns, as it is to get them from Washington? Mind you, these small offices are paid by the number of stamps they cancel and return under oath; I refer to the post-offices where the salary is less than $1,000. Suppose the gentleman had another town in his district which wanted five men to be placed on this salary of $850 each as carriers. The postmaster says, "Here, Tom, Jim, and Dick, go out and sell some stamps to these country postmasters; they would as soon get their supplies that way as not, and we will work up the gross revenues of the office to $20,000 a year, and I will appoint you each to a letter-carrier's position at $850 a year.

I have before me a statement from the Sixth Auditor, giving the cities to which this service under this unwise law of last February will go. I will embody it in my remarks and will now merely state the totals. There are thirty-three cities that are now hungering and thirsting for this letter-carrier service. It has taken us over seventeen years to get the service in eighty-eight cities where it was needed in the main. But here at one stroke, if this law stands, on the 1st day of July you extend the service to thirty-three cities in addition and appropriate the money for it. There are just three of these having a population of over thirty thousand. Galveston is one of them. Eighteen of them have a population under twenty thousand. Twelve have between twenty thousand and thirty thousand inhabitants.

That is not all. The Auditor gives me an additional list of cities yielding from $15,000 to $20,000 of gross revenues last year, when there was no temptation to peddle stamps, if you please; and in round numbers there are thirty-five returning between $15,000 and $20,000 of gross revenues, every one of which without any cost can be entitled to this service on the 1st of July next; so that you would nearly double the number of carrier cities if you carry out that law.

Mr. MCCOOK. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCOOK. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the vote on this "iniquitous" law.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I cannot yield for that. That can be done when we are under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MCCOOK. The vote was 150 yeas and 54 nays. I would like the gentleman to look over the list.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have looked over it; and now since the gentleman has called my attention to it let me pay my respects for a few moments to the history of the passage of this act. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the time of its passage:

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill.

Then after the bill was read:

Mr. BANNING. This is a bill unanimously recommended by the committee.

Now, I have no doubt Mr. Banning thought that was so, but it was a mistake. There was not a word of truth in that statement. It was never recommended by any committee anywhere. I have got the bill here before me which was reported by the Post-Office Committee and went on the Calender for consideration weeks before this bill was passed under the lead of the gentleman from New York It was an entirely different bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not propose to debate it, but to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

How slick my friend gets round these things. I admire him more than perhaps any other member of the House. Some people say he talks too much. But I will tell you one thing—it is a fact that the gentleman knows better when not to talk than any other man. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I am silent now. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman did not want to talk then. He did not want debate.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COX. Your time is up; you had better die. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. BAKER. I move that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended.

Mr. KEIFER. It was on the gentleman's own motion that the time for general debate was limited.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly; and I have yielded half my time to other gentlemen. I do not wish more than ten or fifteen minutes further.

Mr. MONROE. I would be very happy to have my colleague go on, and I think these interruptions should not be taken into account; but I would suggest that the extension of his time should not be taken from the hour to be occupied by those who are to follow him.

Mr. McGOWAN. I object to the extension of time.

Mr. FINLEY. If the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] be extended, will it come out of the two hours?

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the committee rise, so that we may extend the time for debate.

Mr. FINLEY. I have no objection to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] occupying an hour and a half if it does not come out of the time allowed for debate.

Mr. SPARKS. If the fifteen minutes allowed to the gentleman from Illinois is to come out of the two hours, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not.

Mr. SPARKS. I object to more than two hours being allowed for debate, and the Committee of the Whole cannot change an order made by the House.

Mr. COX. You cannot do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having limited the debate, it is not within the power of the committee to change that order of the House.

Mr. McGOWAN. I object to any extension of the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] unless the time allowed for discussion be extended.

Mr. O'NEILL. I insist upon my motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 80, noes 9.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REAGAN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Post-Office appropriation bill, the time for debate be extended one hour.

Mr. McKENZIE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a point of order, and it is that the House has fixed the time for general debate and has laid upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which that order was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in error; no motion was made to reconsider.

Mr. FINLEY. I was under the impression that that was done.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKENZIE] that the House adjourn.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion. I think I can finish all I have got to say in ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPARKS. Then why extend the debate one hour?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The other side will want some extension of time.

The question was taken on Mr. McKENZIE'S motion; and on a division there were ayes 24, noes not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The House has by a vote to-day refused to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the Chair therefore recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] who has moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and has also moved that the time for general debate be extended one hour.

Mr. McGOWAN. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] so as to limit the extension of debate to fifteen minutes.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the time for debate be extended twenty minutes.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] to extend the time for debate one hour.

Mr. McKENZIE. Pending that motion, I move that the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were ayes 3, noes not counted.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was taken on Mr. O'NEILL'S motion to extend the time for debate one hour; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. O'NEILL'S motion, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and being put, the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. REAGAN in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] whether he proposes to have a vote upon this bill to-day?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I suppose that general debate will not close for one hour, and then the committee will consider the bill under the five-minute rule, and I think we can hardly reach a vote to-day.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Then I suggest that it be unanimously understood that there shall be no vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. SPARKS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MONROE. There was a unanimous understanding that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] should have fifteen minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be extended fifteen minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I may want twenty minutes; I cannot tell.

There was no objection, and the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was extended.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have explained the manner in which this law passed the House; now let me call your attention to the manner in which it passed the Senate. I hold in my hand the RECORD of 20th February last, from which it appears that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERRY] in charge of the bill stated that it would cost less than $200,000 per annum to pay carriers the increase of salary provided by the bill. Yet the minimum increase for salaries to letter-carriers to carry out this law as estimated by the Postmaster-General to start on is $377,450, and the maximum is $437,050.

Now, upon that statement, that in no event would the bill increase the appropriations over $200,000, the Senate passed the bill. The great expense that would accrue from putting the service in these little cities of $20,000 gross revenue was never referred to in the Senate at all. Yet it will take $140,000 this year to put it into the cities which are already entitled to it under the law without any question.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object to that. You will have to extend his time again, as sure as the world.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would rather the gentleman would avail himself of the five-minute debate.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Very well. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BAYNE. I understand that there are sixty-four cities in the United States representing about eight millions of the population of this country. Now, I want to know what proportion of the revenues of the Post-Office Department is paid by those cities, and whether or not in virtue of the large excess of revenue paid by them they are not entitled to the advantages of this letter-carrier system?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yes, New York and other large cities pay large revenues; yet, after all, they are mere distributing centers, and if cut off from the balance of the country might not get along very well, and it is true the deficit in the postal revenues as compared with the expenditures is pretty large.

Mr. COX. Now, allow me a moment. The gentleman should not be unjust toward New York. Is there not more than $900,000 surplus annually in New York?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Then why not say it right out like a man? And we feed all the other deliveries.

Mr. McCOOK. From this one source alone there is a surplus of over $900,000.

Mr. COX. And from five cities there is a surplus of more than one and a quarter million of dollars.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is true there is a large surplus in New York, and a small one in Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco; but in small cities of twenty thousand to forty thousand inhabitants the local postages do not pay to exceed one-fifth to one-fourth enough to meet the salaries of carriers. Now, why does the gentleman from New York insist on a lot of small cities of ten thousand population and upward, where they do not need free delivery, being fastened upon the system to eat up the revenues produced in New York?

Mr. COX. You should remember that this system yields a surplus of $979,000 in New York, and you want to cut them off from that benefit.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not yield any further.

Mr. COX. Oh, it is so coarse and bad! I tell you this is the meanest bill I ever saw offered here.

Mr. HAWLEY. I object to this interruption.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The House extended my time. I do not refuse to yield.

Mr. COX. I will ask the gentleman this question: whether he ever saw a rider on a bill so mean, pusillanimous, coarse, little, and despicable as that which is represented by this bill brought in here to repeal a law passed at the last session by a two-thirds vote on an appropriation bill? This bill is meant to cut down the pay of men who are working in New York City fourteen hours a day, because you say that you do not want that sort of business done on the prairie. [Laughter, during which Mr. COX returned to the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Oh, yes; the gentleman shoots his little shooh, and then disappears. How it has grown from twelve hours a day to fourteen hours, in a minute! That is about as accurate a statement as the gentleman is apt to make when he wants to get in some contemptible, little, demagogical proposition in order to get somebody in the purlieus of New York to get up and hurrah for him as the great defender of labor. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Do not shake your finger at me; it scares me. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Oh, yes; that is twice-told wit, as the gentleman once said to Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts.

Mr. COX. Go on now.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman is decaying in his old age. [Laughter.] Why, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCOOK] said a moment ago that these letter-carriers were working twelve hours a day, and that he had that information officially.

Mr. MCCOOK. From twelve to fourteen hours a day.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now, the other gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] comes in and increases it to fourteen hours a day.

Mr. MCCOOK. I said from twelve to fourteen hours a day.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I state here that they do not average twelve hours; and I speak whereof I know.

Mr. MCCOOK. Then you know better than the postmasters.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now, the gentleman from New York says that I oppose this system because we do not need it in my part of the country. It exists in Springfield, represented by one of my colleagues; in Bloomington, represented by another of my colleagues. In quite a number of small cities in Illinois this system exists, and I undertake to say the system is not needed in any city of less than thirty thousand inhabitants, much less is it needed in any little cities of ten thousand inhabitants, where this law will put it. I am tired of seeing the $900,000 excess of local postage in New York City eaten up by these little cities where the system is not needed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Inasmuch as my colleague has referred to Bloomington as a city of ten thousand inhabitants, I wish to say that I understand the population of Bloomington to be nearly twenty-three thousand.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Bloomington is a very handsome city; yet there are not so many people there that they elbow each other when they go to the post-office. There is no reason why they should have this letter-carrier system. They can be served early and late without jostling each other. Yet they have it; and this bill does not propose to take it away from them; but it does propose to stop the extension of this service.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to have printed the cities with gross revenues from $15,000 and upward before referred to and furnished by the Sixth Auditor.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Chairman, I have no feeling in regard to this measure, and I do not rise for the purpose of making an exhaustive speech upon it. A large majority of the Committee on Appropriations voted in favor of the bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has reported to the House. But there were two or three members of the committee who did not vote for it and who reserved to themselves the privilege of explaining briefly upon the floor why they could not unite with their colleagues in support of the measure. I was one of that minority; and the first reason why I cannot give this bill my support is that the Congress of the United States, by a large majority in both branches, with the approval of the President, decided to try this experiment of extending the benefits of the free letter-delivery to a somewhat larger class of cities and also to increase somewhat the pay of letter-carriers.

Mr. Chairman, this Government has but just passed this law—has but just agreed to see how this system will work in the present form. We have not carried out the law which is on the statute-book; the Post-Office Department has not yet had it in its power to put into operation this improved system, as many of us regard it, and to see whether the tax-payers of the United States will not like it. I voted for the bill which became a law only last February, having been introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] I voted for it but a few months ago, when it passed this House; and I feel that it is too soon to ask me to join in the business of repealing my own work. I voted for the measure after deliberation. The gentleman from New York did not take me by surprise with the motion which he made. We had discussed the general subject in the House before, even if we had not discussed just that form of the bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a single question?

Mr. MONROE. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. How many cities containing less than twenty thousand inhabitants, with $20,000 gross revenue, has the gentleman in his district?

Mr. MONROE. I will come to that point directly. I would like to say a word upon that very question of members having an interest, or not having interest, in great public questions on account of their constituencies having some connection with them. I belong to that class of members of Congress who do not believe that it is an unwholesome thing for a member of Congress to represent one hundred and fifty thousand people who have some interest in public questions here. It is not dishonorable, it is not undignified in any way, indeed it is quite to the opposite, for a member of Congress to represent here for good reasons the interests of the people as they exist in his district.

Why, sir, there is an immense manufacturing interest in this country; and a Representative who might come upon this floor and express some interest in that great question might be asked whether there were not factories in his district—as if that disqualified him for forming a sound judgment. There is a great farming interest in this country; and should a member rise in his place and offer some proposition to do something for agriculture, my friend from Illinois might say, "I should like to know whether the gentleman does not represent a district containing many farms." There is a very heavy commercial interest in the United States; and should a gentleman from the city of New York advocate here the claims of that department of business, the gentleman from Illinois might attempt to put him down by asking whether he did not come from a district of importers, ship-owners, and owners of stores and warehouses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this is a country where it is thought discreditable in any way for a member of Congress to represent any important interest touching the happiness or prosperity of the people, then it is the only free government on the face of the earth where it is thought to be so. I know, everybody knows, my friend from Illinois knows, that any one who reads the debates of the British Commons will find, whenever a man connected with any interest in that kingdom rises to speak on it, the report of his speech in the London Times is interspersed with the ejaculations of "Hear!" "Hear!" "Hear!" The man who has an interest, or whose people have an interest in something, is believed in that body, which is certainly one of the great deliberative bodies of the world, to be entitled to speak and to be heard.

I wish I had twenty cities in my district large enough to share in the benefits of the existing law. I should take pride in representing them on this floor, because I believe in extending this system of free delivery to every reasonable extent. I believe it to be one of the instrumentalities of our civilization. I believe it to be a great social and moral boon to any community to have it. I am in favor of including all of our cities as fast as they reach twenty thousand of population or $20,000 of gross income in their post-offices under the benefits of this system. It is my belief that I have not reached my present opinions on that system because there are cities in my State which may be benefited by it.

There are in my district two cities, since my friend has asked me the question, which will be entitled to free delivery—the thriving city of Akron, which is entitled to it now by the gross revenue of its post-office, and the important lake port of Sandusky, which I believe in population or in gross revenue is nearly at the same point. I am glad of it, and I do not consider, Mr. Chairman, that it ought to detract in the slightest degree from the argument of any man on this floor that his State should be full of cities of the class of which I have spoken.

Since my friend from Illinois has put that question to me I might reply by saying that a man may often be thought to labor under some disadvantage as a legislator upon any question who has not a solitary interest in it at home to which his attention has been called. There are two sides to the question. The Representative who has something at home to attend to is certainly as much entitled to be heard upon it as the Representative who, in that respect, has nothing.

I believe it was a distinguished British statesman and parliamentary leader who once said that an important representative interest had a tendency to steady a man's judgment and hold him to thorough examination and a sense of accountability.

I trust, sir, we shall cease to attack men on this floor because they have or have not cities of a certain class in their districts.

The question before the House is, what is wise and useful for us to do? If a man who represents a district which has cities claiming free delivery makes a good argument in favor of the establishment of the system in those cities, you are not entitled to discredit what he has to say; but my friend from Illinois and those who are in sympathy with him must judge such a member by the argument which he presents.

Now, I was going on to say when my friend interrupted me, and I have got somewhat diverted from the line of thought I was pursuing, that I do not like this mode of legislation. If when Congress passes a law and it receives the signature of the President we propose to repeal it before we have had any chance to try it, I say that is a most undignified and unbusinesslike mode of proceeding. It implies the want of proper patience to see what shall be the effect of measures that we ourselves have inaugurated.

I voted for this law which my friend from Illinois proposes to repeal, because I approved of it. I looked upon the postal service as a handmaid of civilization, as tending to improve the moral and social condition of the people. And having voted for that law I have not changed my mind. I cannot be persuaded to turn around so suddenly and seek to repeal the law which I approved and voted for so recently. I have not that facility in shifting ground that I can at once say I will speak and vote against the very measure which I sustained.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I confess I do not like this bill for another reason. I suppose I have sometimes voted for general legislation in connection with appropriation bills. But every man sees and admits that that is a vicious system. If the law which we passed last year ought to be repealed, why not bring in a separate bill for that purpose and let it rest on its merits? Why not let us vote impartially? We all dislike to vote against the deficiency appropriation for the Post-Office Department. We all want to vote for that. But you come and say, "You cannot have that unless you accept this piece of general legislation repealing an important law that both Houses of Congress and the President agreed to." That gives us no opportunity for an impartial consideration of the question. We are compelled either to vote for general legislation that we disapprove or else to vote against the deficiency appropriation that we do approve and that we are anxious to pass. Very likely the bill may be so amended as it passes through the Committee of the Whole that I can vote for it. But I say frankly I cannot vote for the bill in its present form. I would be compelled to vote against the appropriation contained in it in order to vote against these repealing sections.

I hope when our political excitements shall have somewhat passed away, as God grant they may, we shall get back more and more to the system of voting for bills on their merits and not load down appropriation bills with general laws, either repealing laws that have already been passed or introducing new legislation.

I have already remarked, Mr. Chairman, in advance of the point as I had it in my mind, that I am in favor of extending the benefits of the free-delivery system to all cities that have a population of twenty thousand inhabitants and whose post-offices have gross receipts equal to $20,000 per annum. I believe it to be a good thing to be done. I hope I am reasonably in favor of retrenchment. I have always supposed myself to believe in economy. I shall be glad to assist my friend in saving whenever we can. But what is the true idea of economy? Why, Mr. Chairman, it has always seemed to me to be this: that the Government shall take care, as the individual takes care, not to expend money except for something that is worth more to it than the money, or at least as much. Now I believe that the extension of this system of free delivery is worth more to the American people than the comparatively small sum which it will cost. I believe that will be the judgment of the tax-payers when they have had an opportunity to have some experience of this system.

I do not believe, if my friend will allow the law passed last year to go into effect, and a larger class of towns to have the benefit of free delivery and a small advance to be made upon the compensation of letter-carriers, and let that system be in operation a few years—I do not believe it would be possible to persuade him—industrious, able, and intelligent as he is, and as I have always been happy to acknowledge that he is, on financial and economical subjects—to touch, at least with hostile hand, this question of free delivery. Let the people try it. Their Representatives have made a law in regard to the matter; let it go into effect. If it overburdens the people, if the tax-payers find themselves oppressed, you will not fail to hear from them. Their relations are intimate with this House. We shall soon have plenty of remonstrances. As we have passed a law, let us have the law.

And I must add that I do not agree with my friend, that the letter-carriers are paid too much. Of course I will not dwell upon points that have already been made in that connection; but it cannot be too often repeated to this committee that the letter-carriers are kept in service from six o'clock in the morning until seven o'clock in the evening, or later. I have frequently asked intelligent gentlemen from cities how long the letter-carriers work, and no man ever answered me less than thirteen hours. Sometimes gentlemen have said they work from six in the morning to eight in the evening, fourteen hours. And often they have to work more or less on Sunday. Well, now, there is no fairness in comparing the salary of the man who works that number of hours with the salary of a clerk in a Department who goes to his office at nine and returns at four, or with the salaries of persons in other occupations. The laborer does not devote that number of hours to his work. That important point of the number of hours must be kept in mind. And we must not forget that this position of the letter-carrier is a very responsible one. It is one of great trust. It is one that requires sterling moral qualities. He must be a thoroughly honest man, and he must have something more than honesty. He must have that rare and better quality which we generally call fidelity. He must be willing to run about in heat and cold. He must not only be willing to do his bare duty, but, if he is a good man in his place, he must have a certain solicitude—a hearty interest and anxiety to perform his duty. I have seen myself how accommodating these officers are, how ready to meet our wishes. It is worth a great deal to any city in the country to have officers like that in charge of its correspondence of a commercial character, of a financial character, of a domestic character. They are in one sense domesticated with us, and it must be a matter of the greatest interest to all our large cities to have a class of men of the highest character in these positions; and they must at least have a good education.

There is another thing to which I wish to refer. We must look to the fact that men are only fit for performing the best service in this capacity during the middle of life. I understand that the Postmaster refuses to employ those who are quite young or those who are getting old. The truth is that the Government of the United States takes out the very heart of a man's life who is engaged in this service; uses all his most valuable, moral, intellectual, and physical furnishing which God gave him; the Government takes it all and consecrates it to its own use, and then this Government that does it, does not propose to give one cent of pension when the man is old and crippled and has to retire from the service. In all discussions here about the salaries of public officers we must not forget that at the present time this, I believe, is almost the only country on the face of the earth claiming to be civilized that does not provide pensions for faithful, old, worn-out servants. When a man cannot earn anything, when he is no longer strong and active for service, we throw him away; we get all there is in him first, and then when he becomes old and incapable of work, we cast him out with not one dollar of pension to retire upon. The highest class of these men receive $1,000 a year, and the next class $800, and we are told that we are paying too much. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, one word of it.

I tell you that a salary of $1,000 to the highest class of these officers and of $800 for the lower class is not one cent too much for a faithful, honest, upright man who gives the best portion of the life God bestowed upon him to his country. [Applause.] It is not too much. I take issue upon that question. I do not care where the cities are that require free delivery, whether in my district or not; that is not worth a moment's notice. The question is, does God, the righteous, supreme, and everlasting Judge, look with approval upon taking from these men this narrow and small addition to their income by which their life and the life of their families is sustained? Does it meet the approval of conscience and judgment when you come to look at it? I say it does not. I respect the interests of my district. I always give them consideration; they are entitled to a hearing, a conscientious hearing. I admit that I represent a district which has several thriving cities and towns, and a population intelligent, enterprising, and prosperous. But were my district a desert, supposing such a thing were possible under our constitution, if I represented a district where there were no busy towns, no church spires, no schoolhouses, no green meadows, and no fields of corn, I would still vote to give $1,000 a year to the best class of these letter-carriers in New York, Philadelphia, and the other cities of the land.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I desire to make a statement for the information of the House in relation to the manner in which the law passed the Forty-fifth Congress. The remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] might lead the House to believe that the act was passed during the last days of the session, and acted on without much consideration. The facts are that in response to the petitions of over one hundred thousand citizens of the United States, asking that the salaries of letter-carriers be increased, which petitions were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which at the time I was a member, the subject was carefully considered, and a bill was prepared and reported to this House by the late Mr. Quinn, then a member of the committee. It was referred back to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and received further and careful consideration for many months, and in obedience to the instruction of the committee was reported to the House by its chairman, and was at a subsequent day considered in the Committee of the Whole and thoroughly discussed. During the last days of the session it was passed under a suspension of the rules by more than a two-thirds vote, there being 152 votes in the affirmative.

That is the history of this law. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] moved to suspend the rules and pass it, because he was friendly to the bill, and having an opportunity to submit the motion he consented to adopt this bill for action rather than some bill of his own.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I know he does not want to place me in a wrong light.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I say the gentleman lies under a grievous mistake.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I say I do not lie at all. [Laughter.] This bill was thoroughly discussed in the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads at various times during all of last session of Congress. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] always opposed it at all of its stages, and reserved the right to oppose it when it was reported, and did oppose it, though I am glad he was not successful. He opposed the bill then and he now tries to defeat its operation when it has become law.

I do not intend at this time to enter into any detailed discussion of this bill, but under the five-minute debate I may have something to say. I desire to say now for the information of the House that with a proper carrying out of this law under the instructions of the Postmaster-General, giving the largest number the maximum salary of $1,000, the increase of cost over the present service will be $148,000. The intention of the law was to increase the pay of the letter-carriers; that was its purpose, to regulate and arrange their pay. I venture to say that upon a careful examination of the provisions of the law they will be found to be fair, equitable, and satisfactory.

This is an effort to provide by law that the salaries of the letter-carriers in New York and other large cities, for instance, should be reduced to $900 a year, although they have for years been receiving $1,000 a year, and have been in the service from twelve to fourteen years each. Now, it is a very poor way to increase their compensation by cutting it down $100 a year. The postmaster of the city of New York tells me that if it is done he will lose the services of the best portion of his carriers.

I think this service should be extended to the small cities and towns of the country. It is like the general postal service; it ought not to be confined to those cities and States and portions of the country that pay a revenue. If that rule were applied to the general postal service, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires to apply it to this special service, it would leave three-fourths, if not seven-eighths, of the country without any postal facilities at all. The truth is, that we cannot confine these things by State lines or by localities. We should rise to the dignity and honor of the nation, and understand that what benefits one portion of the country will benefit all. If New York is benefited by this system, Minnesota and all the Western States and Territories will be benefited also.

This is the branch of the postal service that pays for its own expenses, and besides that it pays into the Treasury a revenue of $600,000 a year over and above the cost of the letter-carrier system.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to correct an error, or rather to see if I understood correctly the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. TOWNS-

END.] Do I understand the gentleman to say that the bill reported by Mr. Quinn from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is the same bill that was passed last winter under a suspension of the rules?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that that bill was reported from the committee, ordered to be printed, and recommitted. After it was recommitted it was amended, and then I think as amended it was reported back by the chairman of the committee at a subsequent time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. That is all that I desire to say.

Mr. STONE. As a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and in the absence of the chairman of that committee, who is sick and unable to be here, I desire to say a few words in regard to this bill and to enter my protest against any such bill as this being reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

This bill by its title is a bill making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department. Yet there are seven sections of the bill which provide new legislation. Now, I submit that all that portion of the bill relating to the Post-Office Department and providing for the pay of letter-carriers and arranging their grade and employment should emanate, if at all, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The rule of this House which prescribes the duties of that committee provides that it shall take into consideration all petitions, matters, or things touching the Post-Office and post-roads as shall be presented or shall come in question and be referred to it by the House. The law providing for letter-carriers and their duties makes the route or track that every letter-carrier travels in delivering his mails a post route.

I find it stated in the Digest that in the early history of this Government a select committee was annually raised on the subject of the Post-Office and post-roads, and was always composed of a member from each State, showing something of the importance attached to the committee by the House. A standing Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was instituted November 9, 1809, and like the select committee on the same subject was composed of a member from each State. This practice continued until 1811, when the House adopted a rule directing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to be composed of the same number of members as other standing committees.

I refer to this simply to show that we of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads ought to know something in regard to what is the demand of the country in this respect. I am aware that the gentleman who has charge of and who reported this bill [Mr. CANNON] is an old member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I believe he always insisted upon the committee retaining its proper jurisdiction in matters relating to this service; and I am sorry to see that having so recently left this committee and stepped into the Committee on Appropriations, he stands with the latter committee ready to grasp power as we have seen this committee doing in this House.

I wish to say further (and I think the records of the House will bear me out in the statement) that there has not been a petition upon this subject referred to the committee; there has not been a remonstrance received in this House against putting in operation the present law. I say, therefore, there is no demand for this legislation. This committee has not reported this bill in pursuance of any request or in answer to any pressing demand. On the contrary it seems to be the emanation of the inner consciousness of the gentleman from Illinois, who appears here as the champion of this warfare against the letter-carriers, as I believe he has been its champion from the beginning.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. STONE. I certainly yield. I anticipate what the gentleman will say—that he has requested the chairman of the committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report a bill similar to his. If that is what he wishes to say, I will answer it by the statement that our committee has seen no pressing demand or necessity for any such report until at least one petition shall have been received from the people on this subject or a remonstrance against the existing law. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I imagine that the gentleman's guilty conscience accused him. At any rate I did not expect to refer to that matter. Just as I rose to interrupt the gentleman, he had said, as I understood him, that this was a measure prompted by my "inner consciousness"—a matter personal to myself and not coming from my committee.

Mr. STONE. Not at all—not personal.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I so understood the gentleman. On the contrary, I will say that when this matter was referred to me by the chairman of the committee I took it as a member of the sub-committee, and reported back to the committee a bill making these appropriations. True my judgment did not prompt me to do it, yet I did so. The matter was re-referred to the sub-committee, with instructions to report a bill coupled with legislation by which the appropriation would be decreased from half a million dollars to $140,000.

Mr. STONE. There is no great difference between the gentleman and myself. I have no question that this bill was reported by the committee; but I do understand that the gentleman was the chairmain of the sub-committee having this matter in charge, and that this bill is the result of his following out what have been his views for a long time, as we have heard them expressed in the last Congress, and again upon this floor to-day. He has always appeared here as the champion of the warfare against the letter-carrier system. I have no controversy with him on this subject.

I desired to say this much, Mr. Chairman, against the action of the Committee on Appropriations on this subject. This bill is another example of the pernicious system of legislation in appropriation bills. I am glad to say that there is no politics in it, and therefore I hope our friends on the other side will not take offense when I say that it is a very bad practice. Here, within four months of the time when the law now in force was passed, receiving a more than two-thirds vote, almost a three-fourths vote of this House, and before the Post-Office Department for want of funds has had the opportunity to put this law into operation and effect to ascertain what its practical workings will be, we see this Appropriations Committee coming forward with a proposition in an appropriation bill to repeal this existing law; and I am sorry that this committee has been able to obtain the assistance of a gentleman on this side of the House to champion this very unpopular part of their work, for I believe that this measure is unpopular with the people of this country.

I believe, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] has said, that this is more than a matter of dollars and cents. There is such a thing as right and wrong; and we ought to be able to pay our letter-carriers fair compensation. A harder-working class of men does not exist in this country to-day. These men work from twelve to fourteen hours every day, with no holidays, with no allowance for sickness or bad weather. The citizen expects the faithful letter-carrier to come at the appointed hour whether it rains or shines, whether there is heat or cold. Not only this; these men must be above mediocrity so far as information is concerned. They must be intelligent—able to read and write. More than this; they must be honest, they must be able to give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties. Out of their salary must be taken enough to furnish them with the uniform prescribed by the regulations of the Department. Yet, notwithstanding all this, notwithstanding the arduous labors they perform, they receive under existing law less compensation than the pages on this floor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am aware that in one sense it may be said this system does not pay in the small cities, yet the report of the Postmaster-General shows that taking the eighty-eight cities of the United States where this system is in operation the local postage during the last year has exceeded the expense of the letter-carriers by the sum of $628,000. In his last report the Postmaster-General says:

> The postage on local matter exceeded that of last year by $197,653.68 and the entire expense of the service by $628,084.53.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to continue this discussion. I did not expect to take any part in it; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who was prepared with statistics on this question, is unavoidably absent to-day, not knowing that this bill would be brought to the attention of the House.

I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. COX. Will my friend from Ohio yield to me for the purpose of having published in the RECORD some papers in reference to this matter?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Then, Mr. Chairman, I present the following papers: 1, communication from the letter-carriers of the country; 2, a copy of the act approved February 21, 1879; and, 3, the letter of the Postmaster-General, submitting an estimate of the amount of appropriation required to carry into effect the provisions of that act:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 19, 1879.

To the honorable members of the Senate and House of Representatives:

During the Forty-fifth Congress a bill fixing the pay of letter-carriers passed the House by a vote of 151 to 54 and the Senate by a vote of 26 to 16, and was approved by the President February 21, 1879. The bill provided that in cities having a population of seventy-five thousand and upward there should be two classes of letter-carriers to be paid $800 and $1,000 respectively, and that in cities having a less population each carrier should be paid $850 per annum. An additional appropriation was necessary in order that these provisions might be complied with. Under dates of February 21 and March 20 the Postmaster-General asked for a deficiency appropriation for the present fiscal year of $92,000, and for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, of the sum of $415,000. The impression appearing to be general that this sum is required for salaries only, the following statement obtained from the superintendent of the free-delivery service as to the use proposed to be made of the money is respectfully submitted:

Total number of carriers in the service	2,346
Total number of carriers in cities of the first class	1,854
Total number of carriers in cities of the second class	492
Total amount required to pay two-thirds of carriers in cities of the first class, at $1,000 per annum	$1,236,000
Total amount required to pay one-third of carriers in cities of the first class, at $800 per annum	494,400
Total amount required to pay carriers in cities of second class, at $850 per annum	418,200
Total amount required to pay the present force for the year ending June 30, 1880	2,148,600
Amount already appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.	2,000,000
Deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880	148,600
Amount necessary to increase the force	100,000
Amount necessary to extend the service to cities having a population of 20,000	85,000

Incidental expenses	$75,000
Pay of special agents	6,200
Total	414,800
Total deficiency for the year ending June 30, 1880, asked for by the Post-master-General	415,000
Deficiency for the present fiscal year	92,000

It will be seen that if two-thirds of the carriers in cities of the first class are paid $1,000, which the present law allows, but little more than one-third of the amount asked for will be needed, and if one-half only are paid $1,000, little more than one-fifth will be needed for that purpose. The provisions of this law have never been complied with by the Post-Office Department, and the carriers are still being paid under a law repealed February 21, 1879. The Committee on Appropriations in reporting a bill (H. R. No. 2002) making a deficiency appropriation have attached thereto a clause reducing the salary of carriers in cities of the first class to eight hundred and nine hundred dollars, and in cities of the second class to $800, appropriating $25,000 to pay carriers in cities of the second class until June 30, 1879, at $850, as provided by the law of February 21, 1879, and declaring—

"That the salaries which have been paid to carriers in cities of the first class, namely, $641.25, $737.25, and $831.25, shall be declared legal and be continued until June 30, 1879, in full discharge for the service of such letter-carriers, thus enacting a law and making its provisions retroactive, a proceeding which we are informed is very unusual in legislative bodies."

If the law is valid in cities of the second class, it must of necessity be valid in cities of the first class.

"The revenue from local postage in the eighty-eight cities in which the free-delivery system is in operation exceeded the total expenses of that service by $628,084.55 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, as per report of Postmaster-General, and for the present year the amount will be increased more than $200,000. This immense local business has been created by the free-delivery system, and is being daily increased through the exertions of the letter-carriers." We most respectfully submit these facts for your consideration and earnestly ask that the amount asked for by the Postmaster-General may be appropriated, and that the law of February 21, 1879, be allowed to remain on the statute-books.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servants and constituents,

Authorized to represent the letter-carriers of the United States of America.

[Public—No. 47.]

COPY OF AN ACT TO FIX THE PAY OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the more equitable compensation of letter-carriers there shall be in all cities which contain a population of seventy-five thousand or more two classes of letter-carriers, to be fixed by the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 2. The salaries of carriers of the first class, who shall have been in service at least one year, shall be $1,000 per annum, and the salaries of the carriers of the second class shall be $800 per annum. In all cities containing a population of less than seventy-five thousand there shall be one class of letter-carriers, who shall receive a salary of $850 per annum.

SEC. 3. Upon the recommendation of the postmaster of any city, the Postmaster-General may establish a third grade of letter-carriers, known as auxiliaries, who shall be paid at the rate of $400 per annum.

SEC. 4. Appointments of letter-carriers in cities having two or more classes shall be made to the class having the minimum rate of pay, and promotions from the lower grades in said cities shall be made to the higher grades to fill vacancies, after one or more years' service, on certificate of the postmaster to the efficiency and faithfulness of the candidate during the preceding year: Provided, however, That at no time shall the number of carriers in the first class, receiving the maximum salary of $1,000, be more than two-thirds or less than one-half the whole number of carriers actually in service in the city in which they are employed: Provided further, That no boxes for the collection of mail matter by carriers shall be placed inside of any building except a public building or railroad station.

SEC. 5. Letter-carriers shall be employed for the free delivery of mail matter as frequently as the public convenience may require, at every place containing a population of fifty thousand within the delivery of its post-office, and may be so employed at every place containing a population of not less than twenty thousand within its corporate limits, and at post-offices which produced a gross revenue for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $20,000: Provided, This act shall not affect the free delivery in towns and cities where it is now established.

SEC. 6. All laws inconsistent herewith are repealed.

Approved February 21, 1879.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 20, 1879.

SIR: I have the honor to submit for the consideration of the Senate the following estimate of the cost of carrying out the act "to fix the pay of letter-carriers," and to state that the amount ($2,000,000) appropriated for the next fiscal year was estimated on the requirements of the service in the eighty-eight cities where it is now in operation at present pay of carriers, and to extend it to cities having thirty thousand inhabitants entitling them to it under the law in force at the time the estimate was submitted.

The act under consideration (approved by the President February 21, 1879) reclassifies the free-delivery system on the basis of seventy-five thousand population, instead of, as now, on the basis of one hundred thousand; largely increases the aggregate pay of carriers, and authorizes the establishment of the service in cities of twenty thousand population, and also at post-offices which produced a gross revenue (each) for the preceding fiscal year of not less than $20,000.

As this act takes effect from the date of its approval, (February 21, 1879,) there will be required for the remainder of this fiscal year $71,000 to pay the increased salaries, and $21,000 to extend the service, making $92,000.

For the next fiscal year (ending June 30, 1880) there will be required to extend the service and increase pay of carriers, in addition to the appropriation of $2,000,000 already made, $353,000 if one-half the carriers in cities of the first class are paid $1,000, and $415,000 if two-thirds are paid $1,000 a year, as provided in section 4 of said act.

The above statement is submitted for such action as the Senate may deem proper.

I desire to state in this connection that the carrying out of this act will largely increase the work in the free-delivery division of this Department, and to recommend that two additional clerks be authorized at $1,200 a year each, and that the appropriation to pay them be made available simultaneously with the appropriation for carrying the act into effect.

Very respectfully, &c.,

D. M. KEY,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER,
President United States Senate.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, there ought to be no discussion relative to the merits of this bill, considering its origin. It ought to be borne in mind that the law which is sought to be repealed was passed after petitions had come to this House from one hundred thousand persons. And in connection with that we must bear in mind this measure which we are now considering was reported from a committee which did not have a single petition before it asking it to report any such proposition. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Appropriations never has had up to the present moment, as I am informed, the subject referred to it at all—never; and this is pure voluntary action on the part of a committee which, strictly speaking, under the rules has no right to deal with the matter at all. They have the right to provide appropriations to execute the existing laws——

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; I always allow you.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. There was an estimate asking for this appropriation submitted to the House and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KEIFER. Nobody disputes that; all understand that; and it was the duty of that committee to come forward and make the appropriation and not undertake to pass a new law on the subject.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. This one hundred and twentieth rule not only permits but under the practice of the majority of this House commands legislation.

Mr. KEIFER. There is undoubtedly some vile practice in this House, if I may be allowed to use the expression, which permits this committee, and only this Committee on Appropriations, to report any legislation it pleases on an appropriation bill. And, I repeat, this comes alone from that committee without ever having been referred to it so far as the subject-matter of legislation here is concerned.

Now, there is that objection to it, and we ought to consider that this subject was fully debated in this House and in the Senate, for the gentlemen who opposed it took the pains to follow it with their opposition to the other end of the Capitol.

It has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the bill passed without debate. I have not time to go over the whole history of that, but at least thirty speeches were made in the last Congress on this very subject. How many did the gentleman from Illinois himself make against it? Can he tell?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. This bill was never considered in a single instance.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, Mr. Chairman, if that is all that is desired I will call the gentleman's attention to the proceedings in this House on the 7th day of June, 1878, when speech after speech was made. I know a great many speeches on this subject were made, printed, and circulated all over the country. I know my friends on my right made speeches and gentlemen all around me made speeches pro and con; and yet we are now told that the bill was not debated. It was debated on every hand, and every feature of the bill was debated. One feature was not in the bill as originally reported, and I took the pains from my place on this floor to have read as part of my speech, as the RECORD of the 7th of June, 1878, will show, the section of the law which I proposed to have the committee add and which it did add to the bill, and it is there in that speech exactly as it appears in the existing law. I took the pains in my speech then to say that under the old law we had made eighty-seven free-delivery cities in this country, many of them having a gross revenue of less than $12,000, and many having a net revenue of less than $4,000, and yet there were cities in this country under that law with a gross revenue of over $50,000 which could not have free-delivery offices. My own city—and the gentleman thinks I ought not to vote against his bill because of that fact—which had a gross revenue of $34,700, could not under the old law get a free mail delivery, while other cities of ten or eleven thousand gross revenue came in under the old law. Those were the subjects of discussion, and three-fourths of the members of the House, after they had been fully informed, voted to pass the law. So the objection of the gentleman falls that it never was discussed, for it did have discussion on every hand.

As a partial answer, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman's sweeping statement that we are liable to have a very large number of cities in this country that will become free-delivery offices I will say that I hold in my hand a statement made yesterday at the Post-Office Department, showing thirty-four cities that would probably come under the present law and be made free-delivery offices. Every one of them if they are made free-delivery offices would have from $15,000 to $40,000 net revenue to go somewhere else to be expended after having paid all their own expenses, and all the expenses of a free-delivery office. Not one of them would fall below from $13,000 to $15,000 of net revenue and some would range as high as $40,000, after having paid all expenses. I find one city, not a free-delivery office, the city of Denver, Colorado, produces a gross revenue of $53,491. That is among the very highest. The city of Galveston, Texas, has a gross revenue of $54,677 and it is not a free-delivery office.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It has more than thirty thousand inhabitants.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know but the gentleman may be right when he suggests that under the law which he proposes here to-day that city could be made a free-delivery office. There are five cities in the State of Texas that under the existing law would be entitled to become free-delivery offices, but under the proposed law would be excluded. You, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. REAGAN in the chair,] ought to take notice of this because you might be called upon here to vote in favor of some city in your State, and the gentleman from Illinois would have it to throw up to the country that a man had given a vote in the interest of his constituents in some way or other. I suppose that is the extent of the argument. You have five such cities in Texas, and there are nineteen States that would be affected in some way or other by the law if the Appropriations Committee would do its duty and report a proper appropriation to carry it out. I shall take pleasure in furnishing, as a part of my remarks, these lists to be printed in the RECORD, to which I suppose there will no objection.

Now, I do not want to go into this discussion further. It is not necessary to prolong it. It ought to be borne in mind, however, as has been stated by my friend who has just taken his seat, that there are two causes that always increase the revenue at free-delivery offices. One is, in consequence of the additional convenience. Many persons write letters and have mail matter to send out who would not otherwise send it. That is the testimony and the experience not alone in this country but in Europe. If convenient boxes are furnished where a person can, without going a long distance to a post-office, mail his letters, more letters will be written. Many people write letters if they can mail them at a box near at hand when they would not otherwise do it if they had to carry them a mile or two to the post-office to mail them.

But that is not the principal reason why the revenue is increased. It grows out of the fact that in the case of all drop-letters there is paid double postage at free-delivery offices, and in that way this system becomes self-supporting in the main. I think it is reported in some of the former reports of the Postmaster General, if not a recent one—I am not a member either of the Appropriations Committee, which usurps everything, or of the Post-Office Committee, and I may not be exactly accurate—but I think it has been reported that with the exception of four or five of the free-delivery offices in the United States they have been self-supporting on account of the increase of mail matter and also the increase of postage paid in consequence of it. What the last report may show upon this head I cannot say. Taken all together, the increased revenue at free-delivery offices is many thousands of dollars in excess of the increase of the expense incident to the free-delivery system.

Therefore, when we deal with this question, we come back to the fact that we are simply asking to give these flourishing places mail facilities where they pay for them themselves. Now I want to say one word further in relation to the matter of giving further mail facilities to cities that pay for them, and furnish a large net revenue in addition. I think in round numbers the net postal revenue from my city, (Springfield, Ohio,)—and it is no better than others—is $28,000. The amount of gross revenue is nearly $35,000. Therefore we pay in that little city toward carrying the mails and toward keeping up the mail system in other places $28,000 annually. Is it unreasonable to ask to have extended to us the free-delivery system which will enable us to furnish more revenue—perhaps a sufficient increase to pay the whole of the expenses? If we should take $3,000 more from the net revenue of the Springfield office to establish the free-delivery system we should still have $25,000 left to contribute annually to carry the mails over the prairies in Illinois, and to other places throughout the country. Are we to be told that we are greedy because we do not give you more money? Places that do not pay enough money to pay the expenses of the mail facilities furnished them complain that we want to spend more of our own money. That is the effect of the argument on the other side. My city is prosperous. We do a large amount of business there. I am proud to say that through manufacturing industries and otherwise we have built up a flourishing city. We now furnish and are willing to furnish much more than our own share of the revenue to carry the mails. We are quite willing to continue to do so. In my city we make 33 per cent. of all the reapers and mowers that are manufactured or used on the continent of America. We make, also, a large part of the machinery that plows up and cultivates your prairies of the West. We carry on an extensive business of that kind. And we think while we pay a large sum of money for the conducting of the postal service outside of our own place we ought to have all the benefits which can be furnished under the postal laws of this country.

I am not making any argument for my own city that I would not make for any other similarly situated; but I am not ashamed to say one of the things that operates on my mind is the fact that I live in a city that would be entitled to have this increase of mail facilities.

There is just one other city in the State of Ohio which under the present law would be entitled to this service, and that is the city of Akron. Unfortunately, (according to the gentleman from Illinois,) I suppose, for my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE,] it is in his district. There are also several cities in the State of Illinois, Rockford I recollect is one, that might be entitled to the free-delivery system, but the list I furnish will show all these places.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] undertakes to state in his argument in explanation of the revenue of the city of New York that it is a great distributing office, and that is the reason why they have such a large revenue. My understanding of the matter is, and I am willing to be corrected by any gentleman who knows more about it than I do, that where you have a principal distributing office you have to have a great many more clerks, while there is nothing that adds to the revenue of the office. You have in New York and in the principal distributing offices of the country a large increase in the number of clerks merely for the purpose of distributing the mails over the country. But that adds nothing to the revenue of the office. The revenue of the office is derived principally from the sale of post-age-stamps; and the fact of the office being a distributing office makes the expenditures far larger than they otherwise would be. I trust that when we come to consider the details of this bill we shall by a proper amendment strike out all this proposed and objectionable legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman having surrendered the floor is not now entitled to it. There are forty minutes remaining of the time allowed by the House for debate.

The question was taken on Mr. DUNNELL's motion; and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. REAGAN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2002) making additional appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1879, and June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes and directs the Architect of the Capitol to cause a door to be cut through the eastern wall of the reception-room of the House of Representatives, so that there may be direct access across the corridor to the room now occupied by the Committee on Appropriations, provided that it can be done without detriment to the general plans and symmetry of the building or interfering with exisiting laws in regard to the ventilation of the Hall of the House, and that the room now occupied as a reception-room be assigned to the Committee on Appropriations, to be used as a sub-committee room.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Smalls asked me to have these papers withdrawn, for he wanted to use the originals in the case of an indictment against him in the courts of my State, and copies would not answer.

Mr. SPRINGER. At the last session of Congress Mr. Smalls presented several vouchers to the Committee of Elections for the purpose of obtaining an allowance for his expenses. Those expenses were allowed, and he now desires the original papers for use in a trial in the State of South Carolina. It is at his request that this is asked.
